counts for the salary of his Secretary; and lest any one might be injured by his memory failing him, he had sent to the office for the copy of Mr. Lee's account, which he had before him, and stood thus: Compensation for services as Commissioner, from 1776 to 1778, at £500 sterling per annum, £1,638 17s. 9d. sterling. Secretary's salary from 25th March, 1778, to 25th March 1780, at £300 sterling per annum, is £600. By this account the salary of £300 is confirmed; and that he who was the principal had but £500, from whence the impropriety of his Secretary having £1000 must fully appear. It also appears, that he charged his Secretary's salary from March, 1778, which leads to the presumption that before this it had been settled. This presumption is strengthened by its appearing that Mr. S. had received 2,000 livres, which is about full pay for the three months and a half, at £300 per annum; and by the Committee's Report, it is not pretended that Mr. S. was more than four months on this mission. Mr. B. acknowledged that both the present Secretary of State and the select committee report the salary as having been at the rate of £1,000 sterling per annum. But they have been led to this mistake by taking up the salaries of the Secretary to the Minister Plenipotentiary at the Court of France. But it is extraordinary that the difference did not strike them. At the Court of France the Minister was acknowledged, and lived in the manner of other Ministers representing the sovereignty of their Nation, in which expenses their Secretary was in some measure involved; and accordingly the Minister was allowed £2,500 sterling per annum, and the Secretary £1,000. But in the present case the Commissioner, tim incognita, was not acknowledged, and received himself but £500, and his Secretary £300.

From this view of the matter, Mr. B. conceived the application stood precisely in the same terms it did when Mr. Jay reported on it to Congress in 1785, that is, as unsupported by sufficient proof. The certificate from Mr. Deane, adding no weight in the scale of evidence, and even if valid, goes no further than to the appointment, which no one doubts; but is silent as to the terms or what compensation had been made. For these reasons Mr. B. said he must give his negative to the resolution before the Committee, if supported only by the facts on the table.

The House then proceeded to consider the report of the Committee. Whereupon, The first resolution reported by the Committee, in the words following, to wit:

"Resolved, That the accounting officers of the Treasury be directed to audit and settle the account of Stephen Sayre, as Secretary to the Legation of the American Commission at Berlin; and that they allow him seven months' pay at the rate of one thousand pounds sterling per annum, with interest thereon till paid."

was, on the question put thereupon, disagreed to by the House.

The second resolution reported by the Committee, in the words following, to wit:

"Resolved, That Stephen Sayre, late Secretary to Arthur Lee, one of the Commissioners from the United States at Berlin, be allowed the sum of ——— dollars, for extra services rendered the United States subsequent to the departure of Arthur Lee from the Court of Berlin."

was, on the question put thereupon, disagreed to by the House.

PENNSYLVANIA INSURGENTS.

It was then moved and seconded that the House should go into a Committee, on the report of the select committee, on that part of the President's Speech which recommended compensation to the sufferers by the insurgents in the Western counties. The House accordingly went into a Committee, Mr. Cobb in the Chair, and the report was read.

In the clause for making compensation to officers of Government, and other citizens, Mr. Nicholas was for striking out the three last words, and restricting indemnification to the officers of Government, as the additional words would make room for a set of claims which never could be satisfied or put to an end. It is now ascertained that the majority of the people of the four Western counties have always been in favor of Government; but, since it is so, they ought to have supported the insurrection, and saved the expense of sending an army into that country. But as they did not do so, Mr. N. did not see what claim they had for compensation any more than the sufferers in the war with Britain.

Mr. FIDLER thought that sound policy required an indemnification to the sufferers.

Mr. HULLHOUSE was in favor of the report of the Committee as it stood. The whole affair was but a trifle. He understood that the damages done by the rioters did not altogether exceed twenty thousand dollars; and that three-fourths of this sum was for losses sustained by officers of the revenue. The rest of the account was for persons who had fought in defence of the officers, or who had lodged and protected them. He observed that the whole of the select committee were of one mind upon the subject, and agreed in considering the other citizens as equally entitled to indemnification with the officers themselves.

Mr. NICHOLAS was still against the resolutions as originally worded. He did not see any proof of extraordinary attachment on the part of the claimants, nor any peculiar call on the justice of the House in this particular case.

Mr. W. SMITH said, that one man had his whole property burned for having, at the hazard of his life, assisted in attempting to defend the house of the Inspector General. A second received the same treatment for having lodged an excise officer; and a third, because he had antedecently been one himself, though he had quitted his employment before the riots began. Mr. S. urged that these were certainly peculiar and pressing cases, and that it would be highly impolitic not to protect such people.

Mr. GILBERT hoped that there would be no discrimination, but that all the sufferers would be alike reimbursed.

Mr. BOURDIXOR proposed a kind of compromise between the original resolution and the amendment by Mr. NICHOLAS. He proposed that the clause should read thus: "officers of the revenue, and other citizens aiding and assisting them." He was willing to indemnify persons who had actually suffered in defence of Government, but not other persons who might accidentally have been injured by the rioters.

Mr. DAYTON was of opinion that some restriction of this sort was necessary. Citizens were in duty bound to support Government, but the latter was not in all cases bound to indemnify their losses. Let any person go through any part of the country wherever British soldiers had marched, and he would find thousands and tens of thousands of people whose property had been utterly destroyed by the wanton barbarity of these troops. Go to another part of the country and you will find people who suffered very considerably by the American soldiers, when Government did not give them an ounce of bread for pounds that they should have had. It was not possible to make satisfaction to all these people.

Mr. SEBASTIAN said it was extremely disagreeable to attempt detaining the Committee with this subject, to which they discovered such general inattention, that he did not know if it had ever been equalled in any popular assembly before. He again adverted to an argument which he had used on a former day, viz: that when a private person, at the risk of his property and his life comes forward to support the execution of the laws, his service was much more meritorious, and demonstrated a much greater degree of patriotism than that of a revenue officer who was paid for his share of the business. He inferred that the sufferers by the Western rioters should all be equally indemnified.

Mr. HULLHOUSE repeated some of his former reasons for wishing to discharge the whole claims. He was therefore against the qualified amendment of Mr. BOURDIXOR.

Mr. SWIFT was against the amendment of Mr. BOURDIXOR, because he was against giving at present any thing at all. He would suffer the persons who have sustained injury from these rioters and trespassers to prosecute them at law. If they cannot get any retribution in that way, then, and not sooner, you may begin to consider upon the propriety of giving any compensation; but till the parties aggrieved have done their utmost in that way, he would have no steps whatever taken of the nature proposed. It had been alleged that the House might advance money in the meantime to the sufferers, and leave them to their actions against the rioters. But if you pay a man for his damages, what security is there that he will follow up his suit; or is it not evident that such previous compensation will greatly damp his ardor?

Mr. S. said, that if previous notice were given of Government being ready to pay the damages, in cases they could not be recovered before a court of law, there certainly never would be found a jury to bring in a verdict against a private person. For this reason Mr. S. was entirely against the resolution.

tion at this time. What he might do hereafter, he would not say. There was only one case wherein he could be induced to advance money. If any of these persons could prove that they had been reduced by the rioters to such poverty that they were unable to prosecute their claims in a court of law, it might then perhaps be expedient to advance for them the expenses of the suit. But the interposition of the House at this period would affect the claims very greatly, and thus confer on the rioters themselves a favor which Mr. S. was very unwilling to bestow, as he would wish them prosecuted to the utmost. Before the meeting of next Congress, it might be ascertained what could be made of these prosecutions, and then, and not till then, Mr. S. would think it proper to enter on the discussion suggested by the report of the select committee.

Mr. DEXTER drew a distinction between persons suffering by an open enemy, whose approaches they could not avoid, and those who suffer voluntarily. The claim for compensation was complete, and we should do the parties injustice if they did not receive full satisfaction.

Mr. BOURDIXOR withdrew his amendment, under the idea that the particular cases would hereafter come before the House. The question therefore reverted to its former shape, shall the words "and other citizens" be struck out.

Mr. DAYTON, in opposition to Mr. DEXTER, considered the Government of the United States as more justly bound to make reparation to the people who suffered by the robberies and conflagrations perpetrated by British soldiers than to compensate the sufferers in the four Western counties; for those whose houses were burned, and whose property was destroyed by the British, had no quarter to which they could look for relief except to their own Government. The people to the Westward, on the contrary, had it in their power to prosecute the rioters, who were well able to pay them. Mr. DEXTER had said that the losses of the persons ruined by the British were upon record. Perhaps, said Mr. DAYTON, they will always be on record; but nobody supposes that we shall ever indemnify these losses. He thought it prudent for the present to restrict relief to the officers of Government alone.

The question was about to be put, on the amendment proposed by Mr. NICHOLAS to the first resolution in the report of the select committee, when Mr. SCOTT rose. He said, that if there had been a proposal devised to weaken the hands of Government in the four Western counties, there was no one thing which could have effected that point so completely as the striking out of these three words, "and other citizens." If gentlemen would only reflect for a moment, he would ask them how they thought it possible that any civil officer, after the adoption of such an amendment, would ever be able to raise a posse in that part of the country? Who would hereafter venture to defend the life of an excise officer, when the world has been told, that individuals do it at their own hazard, and cannot look to Government for any compensation? Who will hereafter admit an excise officer into his house, if that house may, with impunity, be burned about his ears? As soon as this amendment has gone abroad, everybody, instead of assisting the officers of the revenue will strive to keep out of their way, and have nothing to do with them. If there never had been anything said about making a compensation to other citizens, perhaps there might have been little harm, or at least there would have been much less harm, by forbearing to give them relief. But when the subject has been fairly brought forward by the PRESIDENT in his Speech, and when it had been debated at full length in this House, when so much notice had been attracted, and so many hopes have been thrown out, to give, in the face of all this, a direct negative, would be the most impolitic step that could possibly be thought of.

The Committee then agreed to reject the amendment, and divided on the first resolution as it originally stood in the report of the select committee—yeas 46, nays 37.

The second resolution was then put for enabling the PRESIDENT to draw the sum of ——— dollars for the relief of the sufferers—yeas 41, nays 37.

Mr. SMITH then said, that seventeen thousand dollars had been mentioned in the Committee as sufficient to pay the whole damages. He proposed to fill up the blank with eight or ten thousand dollars, on account, till they should see what was to be the final amount of the claim.

Mr. HILLHOUSE and Mr. KIRKPA both objected to this proposal. The Committee rose. The Chairman reported that the Committee had agreed to the report of the select committee without any amendment. The House were about to take up the report, when Mr. SPOWICK said, that he was really concerned at thinking that there could have been any division at all about such a thing. He still hoped that a measure might be adopted which would produce unanimity on the subject, and would have a much better effect than such a division.

The bill appropriating one million one hundred and twenty-two thousand five hundred and sixty-nine dollars and one cent for the expenses of the militia in the Western expedition, was read a first and second time, and referred to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

WEDNESDAY, December 17.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

Gentlemen of the Senate, and of the House of Representatives:

I lay before Congress copies of the Journal of the proceedings of the Executive Department of the Government of the United States South of the river Ohio, to the first of September, 1794.

G. WASHINGTON.

The said Message and papers were read and ordered to lie on the table.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from the Secretary of War, accompanying certain despatches from Major General Wayne, dated the seventeenth of October and twelfth of November, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-four; which were read and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. CORR from the committee appointed to consider and report on the expediency of making any further alterations in the laws of the United States relative to the cession of the jurisdiction, by particular States, in lands where are established, or may, by law, be directed to be built and established, light-houses, buoys, and public piers, made a report; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

TAYLOR AND HARVEY'S CLAIMS.

Mr. PARKER moved that the House should go into a Committee on the petition and report of the select committee in the case of Isaac Taylor and John Harvey. This was done accordingly, Mr. CORR in the Chair.

The substance of the petition was to remit the duties on certain goods which had been destroyed by fire.

Mr. GOODHUE objected to the principle on which the application went. There never would be an end of such things. A fire happened lately at Boston, which destroyed perhaps ten thousand or twenty thousand pounds worth of commodities that had paid duties. What kind of business would it be if all these persons were to come forward and make a demand of compensation for their duties paid on the articles thus consumed or lost, if a gallon of rum is worth, say, a dollar, and of this thirty cents is paid in duties? When the dealer has his cask of rum lodged in his store, that part of the price of the rum paid to the revenue is as much his property, he is as much richer by the possession of this rum as he would be by having an advance of money to the same amount. The inference of the member was that in case of an accident by fire or otherwise the Legislature had no call to interfere. It was, in fact, making the sufferer a present of so much money, and the House had no business to do any such thing. Claims of this kind never would have a conclusion.

Mr. FITZSIMONS considered it as an act of injustice to our constituents to waste time upon such trifling matters. The House would spend half a day in debating about an affair of two or three hundred dollars, and sometimes of only forty or fifty. Mr. F. declared that, for his own part, he would rather pay his share of the sum demanded than see the time of the House squandered on such trifles. They never would be got through. The more grants, the more petitions.

Mr. PARKER differed entirely from the member last up. He, for himself, had no interest in this case. The parties were no particular connexions of his; but he happened to be a member of the committee to whom their petition was referred, and he wished to see them have the same justice with other petitioners to that House. He differed from the member who had just sat down [Mr. FITZSIMONS] in this respect, that, whether the sum claimed in the petition was two hundred dollars or two thousand, still the extent of the demand made no difference. If the ground was just, it was in both cases, alike their duty to give proper redress. The smallness of the demand was no solid reason for refusing or neglecting it.

Mr. W. SMITH objected, not to the giving relief in this particular case, but to the principle of affording it in any case of this nature. As soon as the present business should be disposed of, he would lay on the table a resolution for considering this practice.

To that Mr. PARKER said he had no objection: only let the present petition be in the mean time treated as others of the like nature had been.

The Committee then rose and reported progress, but leave to sit again was refused.

EXTRA CLERKS.

Mr. FITZSIMONS then observed that there had been frequent applications to the House for salaries and compensations to extra clerks, and he understood that they would have something of that kind during the present session from the Loan Office. To prevent their being harrassed in this way hereafter, he moved the following resolution, viz: That a committee be appointed to inquire into the establishment of clerks in the several Departments, and to report a plan for the number permanently to be employed in each, and their compensation.

A committee of five members was appointed accordingly, to wit: Mr. FITZSIMONS, Mr. LYMAN, Mr. SHERBURNE, Mr. WATTS, and Mr. NEW.

Mr. W. SMITH next laid on the table a resolution that a committee be appointed to consider and report on the policy of remitting the duties on goods, wares, and merchandise, where such goods, wares, and merchandise, have been destroyed by fire or other accidents.

There was then read a Message from the PRESIDENT, which had been delivered a little before, and a journal transmitted along with it, from William Blount, Governor of the Territory of the United States Southwest of the Ohio.

PENNSYLVANIA INSURGENTS.

The House resumed the consideration of the report of the select committee on that part of the PRESIDENT'S Speech respecting compensation to the sufferers by insurgents in the Western counties in Pennsylvania. When the first of the two resolutions in the report was read, Mr. SWIFT objected to the granting of immediate indemnification, on much the same ground as he adopted yesterday in the Committee of the Whole. He inquired how a person, with a compensation from that House in his pocket, could appear in a Court of Justice to prosecute a rioter for damages, when the Judge, the jurors, and every one in Court knew he had been indemnified? He enlarged, at some length, on the great pity that it would be to let those rioters and rebels escape so; and, after they had cost Government above a million of dollars, that they should not be obliged to pay these sixteen or twenty thousand.

Mr. LYMAN hoped that the House would give the money, and have done with the business.

Mr. NICHOLAS.—The more he considered this question, he was the more convinced that the House are involving themselves in embarrassment. Are you not told (said he, alluding to what had been urged by Mr. SWIFT) that, by paying these claims in the first instance, you are cutting the sinews of civil process? In any future commotion of this kind a person who has lodged an excise-man may have his house burnt from private spite against him, and not because he interfered in favor of a revenue officer. Then you are bound, by this precedent, to indemnify him; and how can you distinguish what was the real motive to that outrage? He believed it impossible ever to bring Government to such a state of perfection as that all losses suffered in defence of it should be indemnified at its charge. Where is the difference between this case and that of indemnifying the losses at sea by the British? Yet that proposal was rejected. Where is the gentleman who will say that he believes people will put themselves to the trouble of prosecuting, when they know that the money, if recovered, must go into your pockets again? Let us put the case, that a jury in the Western counties, where these points must be tried, shall find any of these people entitled to less than what you have bestowed upon them? Can you then recover the money back again? It is said that this resolution embraces but a few instances, and these of the most meritorious kind; but, in reality, it includes all citizens who have suffered. What will this comprehend, or, rather, what will it not comprehend? He supposed that the design was that the Commissioners appointed by the PRESIDENT for that effect should be sent into the Western counties to ascertain the damages. Mr. N. concluded by declaring that nothing which he had heard could induce him to go to the extent proposed; and, by giving money at present, the prosecutions would all come to nothing.

Mr. MURRAY hoped the first resolution would succeed. He really thought that the reasoning of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. NICHOLAS] would extend to the exclusion of General Neville.

Mr. MADISON remarked, that great respect was due to this proposition, both on account of the interesting occasion that produced it, and of the quarter from whence it came. But the more he revolved the subject in his mind, the more he was convinced that great circumspection was requisite, and that the House, for many reasons, ought to take as much time in deliberating upon what they ought to do as the nature of the subject will admit. He recommended the proposal of some gentlemen to let the affair lie over to next session.

It is no doubt proper to encourage a spirit for suppressing insurrections, and this measure is certainly calculated to promote that spirit. But, in his judgment, Mr. M. feared that it would likewise encourage insurrections. A great body of people were commonly engaged in such disturbances who were not worth hanging, and to whom an established Government usually held out an amnesty. By this means great multitudes came in, and received pardon before the operations of chastisement began. The mob, therefore, would in this case reason thus: As a crowd, we have a good chance to escape the gallows. Let us then plunder as fast as possible, because Government will disburse the loss, and we shall not be forced to disgorge our booty. Mr. M. thought that speculations of this kind might be entertained by future insurgents, if the House were instantly to vote a complete indemnification to the sufferers. Mr. M. held the highest respect for the arguments and feelings of gentlemen who espoused the other side of the question. What he himself had just now suggested, he did not regard as decisive considerations, but yet as considerations of weight. His own impression was to let the matter lie over till the next session, and then those who had done their best in prosecuting would come forward to that House to claim compensation under the most auspicious circumstances, and all which they shall have recovered will be saved to the State.

Mr. Boudinot differed in some degree from the gentleman who spoke last. He was for doing something at present, though not so much as was implied in the first resolution. He recapitulated the danger that would arise from slackening the efforts of people to prosecute the rioters. He entirely dissented from the principle laid down by some gentlemen, that Government was in all cases bound to indemnify the losses sustained by its citizens from foreign or domestic outrage. In the war with Britain there were great numbers of people who chose rather to fight it out to the last, and permit their houses to be burned by the British troops, than accept of terms which they might have obtained. Mr. B. again proposed the amendment which he laid yesterday before the Committee, viz: that after the words "and other citizens," there should be inserted, "personally aiding and assisting them." This he thought sufficient in the mean time.

Mr. Heath declared himself against the resolution as unsound policy. He feared that it may be an encouragement to future mischief. When an officer of the revenue finds that he is to be so easily paid—to be paid a double value for the burning of his house—will it not slacken his ardor in defence of it? Who has not heard of the rebellion of Shays, where a great deal of property was destroyed? People there began at the right end of the business. Law suits were commenced against the rebels, and damages were recovered. Pray, would it not be a proper bar to the recovery of damages in a Court of law to say Government has paid you? Will not these people who suffered by the Tories in the last war come next, with open mouths, and demand indemnity? We shall next have those citizens who lately suffered by the pirates of Britain hastening to demand compensation. Mr. H. considered this as the most important question which had come before Congress during the present session. He concluded by saying that he would bear his testimony against this resolution.

Mr. Carnes was of the same opinion. Mr. Murray had said that it would be impossible to find a jury in the Western counties who would give honest damages against the rioters, because almost every body was on their side, and there would be no possibility of finding a jury who would pass an equitable verdict, unless recourse was had to the odious and execrable practice of packing juries. This remedy was worse than the disease; and from this Mr. Murray inferred the futility of compelling the sufferers to wait for the result of hopeless prosecutions, and the propriety of immediately paying the damages. Mr. Carnes asked the gentleman whether his knowledge as a lawyer did not inform him that an upright jury might be selected without having recourse to the infamous expedient of packing? When a jury were chosen, the prosecutors would be at liberty to except against them; and if they were either men of bad characters, or in any shape connected with the rioters, these exceptions would be admitted, and this process would go on till a respectable jury could be chosen. This was quite distinct from any thing like packing. He considered this explanation as a satisfactory answer to the arguments advanced by the member from Maryland; and he entertained a better opinion than that gentleman seemed to possess of the jurymen in the Western counties. Mr. C. foresaw many bad consequences that might possibly flow from this alacrity in discharging damages. What if there should be a collusive insurrection between two parties, and then, instead of twenty thousand dollars, we shall have to discharge a bill of perhaps an hundred thousand, or twice that sum? He considered it as good a plea in bar of prosecutions to say, Government has paid you. But if we are so fond of indemnifying people who suffer losses, the House may begin by satisfying the settlers in the back part of Georgia, where the Creeks within the last ten months only have done mischief to the extent of five or six hundred thousand dollars. He should be glad to hear the House disposed to indemnify these people, but it was what he did not expect. He could not see why these sufferers were not as much entitled to compensation as the others in the four Western counties. As to the Creeks, the State of Georgia was neither at war nor peace with them. Peace it was called, but in the mean time the savages were committing incessant murders. Reverting to the question before the House, Mr. C. said, that it would be most impolitic to proceed at present in the payment of these losses; and he was convinced that the President himself, when he made the reference in his Speech, did not intend that the thing should be acted on immediately. Mr. C. hoped that there would be a delay for the present session. The best way to ascertain the real extent of the damages was to leave the matter to the decision of a jury. When juries have determined this point, then, if the rebels cannot pay, give satisfaction to the sufferers in terms of the verdicts. The member from Maryland had said, that damages could not be accurately specified by a jury. Yes. If you pay nothing at present, but, if you pay at present, the action is barred. Mr. C. had not entirely formed his opinion on the question of compensation, but he was satisfied that it was better to make a delay.

Mr. Dexter, in reply to the supposition that this compensation would encourage future insurrections, gave it as his opinion that it would be the means of preventing them. An insurgent would say to himself, "I might escape from the States assist him, I cannot stand against both." Mr. D. conceived that the meaning of the resolution had been mistaken, and he placed the question in a light entirely new and unnoticed by any former speaker. Gentlemen had spoken as if the resolution went to the immediate and complete discharge of the whole damages, and upon this many arguments had been founded. This idea was an entire mistake, for the first resolution went only to ascertain the real extent of the damages, and did not pledge the House to pay the total amount of them. He considered this as a very material distinction, and which, in a great measure, obviated many arguments on the opposite side of the question. Mr. D. did not think, with the member from Georgia, that the same rule applied to the Southwestern settlers of that State and to parties in the present resolution. The people on the frontiers have "placed themselves in a place of danger knowingly." The Creeks were an open enemy, but the insurgents were an unexpected one. Mr. D. proceeded at great length to make a distinction between the two cases, and concluded by saying that the second resolution, which, as well as the first, he hoped would pass, went only to a temporary relief.

Mr. Hartley also placed a part of the question in quite a different light from any former gentleman. Since he had been a member of that House he had found occasion to read a good deal of law, and, from that knowledge of law, he had, yesterday, in the Committee, informed the House that neither General Neville nor any body else could obtain damages against the rioters in a civil action. All the arguments, therefore, which had been advanced as to whether equitable damages could be recovered before a jury, proceeded upon an error, because no civil process whatever would lie in the case. If the House were disposed to doubt his own opinion, Mr. H. could now give them that of the first law officer in Pennsylvania. Since yesterday Mr. H. had consulted that gentleman, who gave it as his express opinion that the greater crime absorbs the lesser; that a case of this kind is only a criminal action, and that no penal damages can be recovered. The crime is liable to a capital punishment; he did not mean to death; but to such a degree of punishment as the offence should be found to deserve. Mr. H. added, that if people had known that they were to be indemnified for their losses by the United States, a much greater number would have stood by the law than did so. It was not the fear of personal danger which prevented people from resisting the insurgents; it was apprehension of having their barns burned down in the night time.

Mr. Dexter interrupted Mr. Hartley to inquire whether, by the laws of this State, the property of an insurgent is forfeited for his crime? Mr. Hartley replied that it was not. Mr. Dexter then remarked, that it was very absurd to say to a man, "You are an insurgent; you have committed a great deal of mischief, but you are so very deep an offender that I cannot recover damages." Mr. Hartley rose again to give some further explanation, when the SPEAKER announced that he had something to communicate to the House. Mr. Hartley sat down, and the SPEAKER said, that he had received from the PRESIDENT some important and confidential communications, which it was requisite to read in the House this day. It did not appear that they would decide on the first resolution at present, and there was not now more time left before the common hour of rising than would be necessary for reading the communications from the PRESIDENT. The debate was instantly deferred, and the galleries cleared.

THURSDAY, December 18.

Mr. Goodhue, from the committee to whom was referred the petition of Ephraim Jones, in behalf of himself, Stephen Gorham, Shubal Gorham, and Charles Selden, made a report; which was read, and ordered to be committed to a Committee of the Whole House to-morrow.

PAY OF MILITIA.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill making appropriations for the expense of the Militia lately called into the service of the United States.

Some objections were made to the bill. Mr. Fitzsimons said that they were the most extraordinary which were ever made in this House to an act of appropriation. Gentlemen had certainly never looked into the estimates, or they never could have made them. It was not pretended or supposed that, in the estimates in this act, the sums were exactly ascertained. So far from that, we have, in this bill, voted the pay at three dollars per month, whereas the House itself had since augmented that pay to six dollars and two thirds. Gentlemen need not be afraid that any money would be given out at the Treasury without a proper receipt.

One of the objections to the bill was understood to be, the fear lest more money might be voted than would be necessary, and that the United States would thus be losers. The gentleman who had made this remark admitted afterwards that the explanation was satisfactory.

The Committee rose, and the Chairman reported the bill without amendment. It was then ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time to-morrow.

FRIDAY, December 19.

WILLIAM IRVING, from Pennsylvania, appeared, and took his seat in the House.

An engrossed bill making appropriations for the expense of the Militia lately called into the service of the United States was read the third time, and passed.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Report from the Secretary of War, accompanying copies of the instructions to the engineers for erecting fortifications for the defence of the seaports of the United States, together with their reports thereupon, made pursuant to the resolution of the 8th instant; which was read, and ordered to lie.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill, entitled "An act to regulate the pay of the non-commissioned officers, musicians, and privates, of the Militia of the United States, when called into actual service, and for other purposes," with several amendments; to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

The House proceeded to consider the amendments proposed by the Senate to the said bill. Whereupon, Ordered, That the said amendments be committed to Mr. MADISON, Mr. DEARBORN, and Mr. DAYTON.

Mr. BENJAMIN BOURNE, from the committee appointed, presented a bill authorizing the transfer of the stock standing to the credit of certain States; which was read twice, and committed.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from the Secretary of War, accompanying certain communications from the Governor of the Territory of the United States South of the river Ohio; which were partly read.

PENNSYLVANIA INSURGENTS.

The House resumed the consideration of the resolutions reported on Wednesday last, from the Committee of the Whole House, on the report of the committee to whom was referred that part of the Speech of the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES which relates to the policy of indemnifying the sufferers by the depredations of the insurgents in the Western counties of Pennsylvania. Whereupon,

The first resolution being under consideration, in the following words, to wit:

"Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause an ascertainment to be made of the losses sustained by the officers of Government and other citizens in their property, (in consequence of their exertions in support of the laws,) by the insurgents in the Western counties of Pennsylvania."

The amendment of Mr. BOUNDNOT, on which the House had been debating on Wednesday, was read. It was for the insertion, after the words "and other citizens," of the following addition: "personally aiding and assisting them."

Mr. HARTLEY then rose, and spoke as follows: I have no great encouragement to speak, when I find that my expressions and language have been totally mistaken, both by gentlemen in this House and by the person who frequently reports the debates. On Tuesday, I had ventured to say, that I thought no great reliance could be had upon the individuals injured obtaining satisfaction by personal actions against the insurgents; that I imagined the civil remedy was merged in the offence of arson against the State, or perhaps a higher offence; that from the state of things, we could not promise ourselves that the sufferers would be compensated by civil suits.

On Wednesday, I mentioned to the House, that, though there had been much discussion, yet, as I considered part of the House to labor under what I held to be a mistake with respect to the lex loci, or law of the State, which we were obliged to take into view, I held it my duty to observe, that, the day before, I had said that I thought the smaller offence, that is, the civil injury, had been merged in the greater against society; that the offence, so far as related to the State, would be arson, which had been a capital offence, punishable with death, that the punishment had been mitigated by the alteration of the penal code, but still it was a felony. I noticed that I had formerly read law a good deal with considerable attention, but since I had been in Congress, I had not been able to bestow much time upon it. I said that formerly certain principles or maxims had made impression upon my mind; that, among others, was the one under consideration, that, in arson, the injury to the individual was merged in that against society, or, at least, must give way to other; and public justice must be done in the first place. I mentioned that I had consulted one of the first law officers of the State, which is true, and he agreed with me in opinion. Indeed, he added, that no reliance should be had upon the personal remedy, but that compensation ought to be made to the sufferers.

I have no reason to change my former opinion. Really, when I consider the conduct of the Commissioners to those who made their submissions, I should imagine it was the intention of the parties that there was to be an oblivion as well of the civil as the criminal offences to those who submitted; and, as the Legislature has the power to construe the agreement, it becomes her rather to do it with magnanimity than otherwise.

Your officers, and those aiding and assisting them, ought to be protected and supported. I will now say, as I did the other day, that the fear of having their houses or barns burned, terrified many a man in the Western country from joining the standard of the law, and forced him to temporize with rebellion. When the officers know that they are to be protected in their persons and property—when the posse comitatus are informed that they are to be regarded in like manner—we may expect energy in the execution of the laws. The law of Pennsylvania is defective, or at least doubtful; and, if the present punishment for arson continues, the Legislature of that State will, I dare say, point out a decided remedy for the party injured against the offender. It becomes the honor and justice of the Legislature to protect and support the officers, and those aiding them. I shall, therefore, vote for the amendment.

Mr. VENABLE differed entirely from the gentleman who spoke last. He understood that pardons extended only to the offences against Government. It would, for that reason, be no hardship against the people who had received pardons to prosecute them for civil damages; and, by the statement of the member himself, actions would lie where no public prosecutions had been made.

Mr. SWIFT was of opinion that the member from Pennsylvania [Mr. HARTLEY] was most certainly mistaken in point of law, when he imagined that the pardon granted by the Commissioners extended, or might be construed to a remission of civil offences. He did not believe it to be in the power of Government to pardon these rioters and trespassers to that length. He did not expect that the gentleman from Pennsylvania would have stood up in the House to recommend an unqualified pardon. When a million of dollars had been expended, were the House to give them fifteen or twenty thousand dollars more? He did not come there prepared to hear of a premium for insurrection. He rejected all idea of so much tenderness for rioters and rebels.

Mr. BOUNDNOT rejected all idea of the rioters being exempted from civil suits. There was but one exception, where they were executed for their crimes. He had no other view of the matter, but as a question of policy—whether it was expedient, or the contrary, to prosecute these people. He believed that, before the new Constitution, the law stood as the member from Pennsylvania represented it. But all this was much from the purpose. By far the greater number of the rioters have accepted the amnesty. Nobody imagines them exempted from prosecution. To prevent any misconception of this nature, the Commissioners, in the terms of pardon which they held out, expressly warned the people that they were to be liable to civil actions for the damages committed. It was needless, then, to embarrass the question with more difficulties than naturally belonged to it. He was satisfied that this was a mere question of policy, whether it was better to pay off these people at once, or let them first try the effects of civil actions.

Mr. DAYTON rose and asked, "Who shall decide, when doctors disagree?" Who shall declare what is the law, when the learned gentlemen of the bar are so directly opposed to each other? The House (Mr. D. observed) had, by some means, imperceptibly, and, he thought, unnecessarily, been drawn into the discussion of a common law question. Law had been aptly compared to a bottomless pit, and the sooner, therefore, that they extricated themselves from it the better. Very fortunately, (he said,) there existed no necessity for determining, in the present cases, upon any intricate point of law, as the proposals of amnesty, in their very terms, as well as in their nature, left each individual trespasser liable to suits at law on the part of the friends of good order, for the damages sustained by the one and done by the other. Mr. D. was for allowing those prosecutions to go forward, and was well informed, not only that there was far more than sufficient of the property of the insurgents to make compensation, but that it was probable they would agree together, and make up the whole among themselves, rather than be vexed by lawsuits. He could not agree with those gentlemen who expressed a wish to vote the whole amount of damages, immediately to be paid from the Treasury. He did not believe with them, that such a measure would promote the dignity, or manifest the justice, of the Government. This would be to enter into an improper compromise with guilt. It would be to make peace with sedition, in a way that might tend to encourage rather than to discourage it in future. We were obligated, upon principle and precedent, to insure indemnity to those officers of Government, who, in consequence of a prompt and steady discharge of their duty, had suffered in their property from the resentment of the insurgents. But he wished not to do more, until the result of actions at law could be ascertained. Although the Government may offer a pardon for offences against the public, yet nothing was more clear than that the general amnesty did not, and could not, exempt the seditious offenders from answering to private persons for injuries done to them in their property.

Mr. HARTLEY rose to explain. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. SWIFT] had mistaken his meaning. He was going on, when

Mr. DAYTON rose, and declared that he had never put any such construction on the words of the gentleman, who certainly must have misapprehended him.

I did not mean you, sir, (said Mr. HARTLEY). I said the gentleman from Connecticut. You made a mistake of the same kind with me last session.

The amendment of Mr. BOUNDNOT was, on a division, lost—only twenty-six gentlemen rising when the question was called for.

The question on the first resolution was then called for; when it was moved to take the previous question, that is to say, "Shall the main question be now put?"

Mr. FIRZMONGER rose. He thought that this discussion comprehended a principle of the most important nature. He trusted that it would not be got rid of in this way. He was not of opinion with those gentlemen who were disposed to waive the question just now, under the notion that they should have an opportunity of voting for it at another time. He believed that the true design of moving the previous question was to lay it aside altogether. This expedient should not answer the end; for, if he had only one other gentleman in the House to second him, he would stand by the matter till he obtained an explicit answer.

Mr. McDOWELL vindicated the propriety of taking the previous question.

Mr. SEPOWICK said, that, when the British carried on a most unjust war against this country, the Ministry who began it were in time turned out. Their successors had always reprobated the war, but after the peace, they, notwithstanding, had expended several millions to support the loyalists. While the British had acted with so much liberality, did it become America to stick at the paltry sum of seventeen thousand dollars? The House had wrangled so long about this matter, that the very wages which they received for the time spent in this discussion would about have discharged the whole sum in dispute. When a wild, unprincipled, mad attempt had been made to destroy this noble Constitution, were the Representatives of this people to make it a doubt whether those who saved it from, perhaps, destruction, were to be indemnified? Mr. S. declared that he felt more unpleasant sensations than he remembered ever to have experienced since he became a member of this House. Gentlemen might argue and argue about this drop in the bucket compared with the ocean. They might go into metaphysical deductions about whether the men who saved this Constitution were, some of them, to be reduced to beggary and misery, as the price of having done so. He would bring up the question again and again, until he had the sense of the House again. Mr. S. repeated the following argument, which he, on a former day, had pressed: He asked whether persons who, from the pure, conscious dignity of the republican character, stepped forward to support the Government, did not deserve better of it than excise officers, who were bound to and paid for their services? He was even of opinion that the conduct of the private soldiers in this case was more meritorious than that of the officers. He might be mistaken, but his opinion was so. From this language, it is not to be inferred that Mr. S. undervalued the exertions of the officers of the Army, or of the excise. He only meant that the less interest or emolument which an individual has at stake in the success of an affair, the greater is his merit in performing it. He asked what better time there was than the present for settling the amount of these claims?

Mr. HAZEN was for the previous question. He thought the resolution unseasonable at this time. However little the gentleman chose to think of seventeen thousand dollars, they might grow into a precedent for seventeen hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. BOUNDNOT thought that the seventeen thousand dollars were not the whole of the damages that might be claimed. When Commissioners were sent to the Westward, the demand might rise to seventy thousand. Numerous other requisitions might start up. He was for taking the previous question.

Mr. DEXTER regretted his necessity to differ from a gentleman [Mr. BOUNDNOT] for whose opinions he was in the habit of entertaining the highest respect. He was against the previous question, because he disliked obliquity. Whether he was against or for the first resolution in the report of the select committee, he would give the resolution itself a fair meeting. He then inquired what better time there could be for learning the number and extent of the losses than the present? He again explained, as on Wednesday, that the House appeared to mistake the extent of the redemption, which did not imply any complete indemnification, nor even assure any relief at all. The whole only amounted to the taking of measures for obtaining information. He would not have voted for it, if he had thought that it promised complete indemnification. He thought that no future time could be so proper as the present for deciding.

Mr. SWIFT, Mr. KITTERA, and Mr. GILBERT, also spoke.

Mr. HILLHOUSE went on the same ground with Mr. DEXTER. He was one of the committee who drew up the resolutions. They never understood that the resolution implied an assurance of complete indemnity to the sufferers.

The previous question was called for by five members, to wit: "Shall the main question, to agree to the said resolution, be now put?"

And on the previous question, "Shall the said main question be now put?" in was resolved in the affirmative—yeas 52, nays 31, as follows:

NAYS.—Theodorius Bailey, Thomas Blount, Thomas P. Carnes, Gabriel Christie, Joshua Coit, George Dent, William B. Giles, James Gillette, George Hancock, Carter B. Harrison, John Heath, John Hunter, Richard and Bland Lee, Matthew Locke, James Madison, Joseph McDowell, Alexander Mebane, Andrew Moore, Anthony New, John Nicholas, Nathaniel Niles, Robert Rutherford, John S. Sharburne, Jeremiah Smith, Israel Smith, Zephaniah Swift, Thomas Tredwell, Abraham Venable, Francis Walker, Paine Wingate, and Joseph Winston.

Mr. GILBERT then moved a resolution, the substance of which was understood to be to ascertain whether the losses in the Western counties were incurred in defence of Government, and how far the sufferers were capable of carrying on the law-suits themselves against the rioters.

Mr. Giles was against the amendment, the resolution itself, and the whole mode of conducting the business. He had listened to many long speeches, and been surprised that no gentleman had made the observation which he was now going to submit to the House.

[The noise had by this time become so intense, that the SPEAKER rose and reminded the members of a rule that there must be no private conversation while a member addresses the Chair.]

Mr. G. then proceeded to declare that he disliked the form rather than the substance of the resolution. If people in the Western counties had suffered injuries, why should not they, as well as every other class of citizens, come to the bar of that House and petition? An inquest was, he imagined, intended, which would unite all the back country in one common interest against the Treasury of the United States. The mode proposed by the report of the select committee was the most exceptionable of all that could have been devised. It was said that this was only an affair of seventeen thousand dollars. What evidence have we that the demands will stop there? Sir, there is none. The mode is, besides, totally wrong. Let persons who have suffered come here in the usual manner. It is said that a gentleman has had his house burned. Let him come here and tell us so. Mr. G. entirely scouted the idea advanced by Mr. DEXTER, that we might inquire into the extent of the losses, without a design to discharge them. If you do not mean to indemnify, why inquire at all? He did not object to relieving the sufferers, but to erect a board of inquiry, under Presidential direction, was what he never would consent to. He again repeated, that he did not mean to dissent from the principle, but from this most exceptionable of all modes for putting it into practice. Let people lay memorials of their losses before the House, which would then see distinctly what it was doing, and examine the evidence on which the claim was founded. He wondered that none of all the speakers in the debate had adverted to this distinction.

Mr. HILLHOUSE differed in every particular from the gentleman who spoke last. If petitioners come from the Westward, they are referred to a select committee. They bring all the evidence which they can muster to swell their bill. The committee have no counter-evidence, as we in this House almost never hear more than one of the parties. It is much better to send persons to the spot who can examine the subject on both sides, which we cannot possibly do, and who will be responsible to this House for their conduct. The whole arguments and ideas of Mr. H. were in direct contradiction to every thing advanced by Mr. GILES. He (Mr. H.) was satisfied that, before we undertook to pay the losses of the Western people, it was better, in the first place, to know the extent of them. The resolution amounted to nothing more than the ascertaining of this loss, and Mr. H. could see many good reasons for deferring the payment of a bill until he knew the sum to which it amounted. He could also see reasons why the mode recommended in the resolution was much preferable to that of bringing people so far to the House. Commissioners going to the spot could make themselves perfectly masters of the subject; whereas, if the parties come here, the matter will be decided on ex parte evidence, as it always is.

Mr. BOUNDNOT considered the resolution as too loosely worded. A gentleman who had been on the expedition, and who had heard or read the report, observed to him [Mr. B.] that he himself came within the resolution, as he had suffered considerably in his business by his absence. Mr. HILLHOUSE explained, that the resolution extended only to actual destruction. The committee never meant to compensate people for the loss which they had suffered by being banished. He was ready, if the House liked it better, to insert in the first resolution the words "property actually destroyed." This would prevent the misapprehension of the gentleman mentioned by Mr. BOUNDNOT.

The House divided on the amendment of Mr. GILBERT—yeas 39, nays 33.

Mr. HILLHOUSE then moved to strike out the word "in" from the first resolution, and put into its place "by the actual destruction of" their property.

Mr. MADISON apprehended that this amendment left the resolution as bad as it was before, if not worse. A person in the Western counties had his horse stolen by the insurgents. But this did not imply the absolute destruction or annihilation of the horse. The amendment meant either too much or too little. It certainly could be no improvement on the resolution.

After some further discussion, the amendment was agreed to.

And the main question being put, that the House do agree to the said resolution, amended to read as follows:

"Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause an ascertainment to be made of the losses sustained by the officers of Government, and other citizens, by the actual destruction of their property (in consequence of their exertions in support of the laws) by insurgents in the Western counties of Pennsylvania; together with a report of the particular condition of the respective sufferers, in relation to their ability to prosecute their several claims, and recover, at law, satisfaction from the insurgent aggressors."

It was resolved in the affirmative.

The second resolution on the subject of indemnification was then taken up in the House.

Mr. BOUNDNOT moved the following amendment:

"To aid such of the sufferers as, in his (the President's) opinion, stand in need of immediate assistance, to be accounted for by them in such manner as may hereafter be directed by law."

The amendment was carried, forty-four gentlemen rising.

The resolution, as amended, is as follows:

"Resolved, That the President be authorized to draw out of the Treasury of the United States the sum of — dollars, to be applied by him to aid such of the said sufferers as, in his opinion, stand in need of immediate assistance, to be accounted for by them in such manner as may hereafter be directed by law."

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in pursuant to the said resolutions; and that Mr. HILLHOUSE, Mr. FINDLEY, Mr. LYMAN, Mr. WATTS, and Mr. WILLIAM SMITH, do prepare and bring in the same.

EXPENSES OF THE MILITIA.

The House next went into consideration of the amendments of the Senate on the bill as to the expenses of the Militia. The principal of these was for augmenting the bounty on enlisting.

This produced a variety of remarks from several members, who agreed in condemning the amendment of the Senate as, to the last degree, useless, and even pernicious.

Mr. BEATTY observed, that the increase of bounty always insured a greater number of recruits, but then they were of a much worse description than those who accepted a lesser bounty. In fact, the large bounty is not the means of filling the Army. Three-fourths of such recruits run off without ever seeing the camp. Every recruiting officer will tell you, that, if he is suffered to offer a large enough bounty, he will soon fill his company. But then, though the lesser bounty gathers men more slowly, they are much more likely to stay. With a large bounty, there are always two desertions for one.

The amendments were referred to a select committee.

MONDAY, December 22.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill authorizing the transfer of the stock standing to the credit of certain States; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee reported the bill without amendment.

Ordered, That the said bill be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire and report the means of providing for the payment of the third instalments due on a Loan made of the Bank of the United States, and for the payment of any instalments which may fall due on foreign loans, in the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-five.

Ordered, That Mr. SEDGWICK, Mr. GILES, and Mr. IRVINE, be appointed a committee pursuant to the said resolution.

Mr. MADISON, from the committee to whom were committed the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act to regulate the pay of the non-commissioned officers, musicians, and privates of the Militia of the United States, when called into actual service, and for other purposes," made a report; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Ordered, That a committee be appointed to consider and report on the policy of remitting the duties on goods, wares, and merchandise, in cases where such goods, wares, or merchandise, shall be destroyed by fire, or other accident.

And a committee was appointed, of Mr. VENABLE, Mr. SCOTT, and Mr. CLAIBORNE.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill, entitled "An act to establish the office of Purveyor of Public Supplies;" to which they desire the concurrence of this House. The Senate have also passed the bill, entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of Government, for the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-five," with several amendments; to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

The House proceeded to consider the amendments proposed by the Senate to the said bill.

Whereupon, The first, second, and third amendments were, on the question severally put thereupon, agreed to by the House.

Ordered, That the other amendments proposed to the said bill, be committed to Mr. BLOUNT, Mr. FOSTER, and Mr. JEREMIAH SMITH.

The bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act to establish the office of Purveyor of Public Supplies;" was read twice and committed.

NATURALIZATION BILL.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill to amend the act, entitled "An act to establish a uniform rule of naturalization."

Mr. DEXTER after some observations on the importance of the subject before the Committee; and expressing his disapprobation of the facility by which, under the existing law, aliens may acquire citizenship, moved that the term of two years in the bill referring to the previous residence should be struck out and a blank left, to be filled up after more mature consideration. This motion was agreed to. Another amendment was proposed by that gentleman, referring particularly to the mercantile foreigners who may wish to acquire citizenship.

Mr. PAGE said, that he approved the design of the mover, because he thought nothing more desirable than to see good order, public virtue, and true morality, constituting the character of citizens of the United States; for, without morality, and indeed a general sense of religion, a Republican Government cannot flourish, nay, cannot long exist; since, without these, disorders will arise, which the strong arm of powerful Government can alone correct or retrieve.

But he should vote against the amendment, because he thought, as his colleague [Mr. MADISON] did, that it would be attended with embarrassments to the admission to the rights of citizenship, which good men ought not to have thrown into their way; and which, too, for his part, he thought might prove insurmountable obstacles to such. Yet they would be no impediment to the views of bad men, or such as he wished to exclude from citizenship, for the best man in the United States might not procure the certificate required by the amendment, if he moved from State to State, staying no where long enough to enable two persons to swear that they had known him to be of such a character as we require, and to have supported it during the length of time which the amendment prescribes.

Yet bad men, associating chiefly with men like themselves, regardless of oaths, might procure the requisite certificate. He disliked the amendment on account of its requiring an oath at all. He trusted, that a Constitution much admired, and with such wholesome laws, will be an inducement to many good men to become citizens, and that, should bad men come amongst us, they will be discountenanced by the more virtuous class of citizens, and if necessary be punished by the laws. He hoped that good schools would soon be spread over all the States, and hence that good sense and virtue will be so generally diffused amongst us, that emigrants will be unable to corrupt our manners. Even at present, he relied so much on the virtue and discernment of his fellow citizens, the power of the law, and the energy of Government, as to apprehend no danger from emigration into the United States. Mr. P. said, that he knew instances of difficulties which some worthy men had met with in their endeavors to procure such certificates as the amendment proposed. He mentioned ed one clergyman in Virginia. Even Dr. Griffith, after being nominated Bishop of that State, found it difficult to procure from the Convention the certificate required by the English bishops; because, though hundreds of other persons knew his worthy character, a sufficient number of the members of the Convention had not known it, during the term specified in the certificate required.

Mr. DEXTER's motion was now withdrawn.

Mr. GILES then proposed an amendment the object of which was to impede a return to citizenship of those who should expatriate themselves. He proposed that a special law of the State from which such persons should detach themselves, should be requisite in order to their being re-instated.

Mr. TRACY, after observing, that although he was not in favor of a perpetual allegiance as understood by the British Government, yet he was of opinion that the return of persons who should expatriate themselves ought to be clogged with greater impediments than simply a law of a particular State. If the amendment is a proper one, of which he confessed he had his doubts, he would suggest to the gentleman an addition, by making a law of the General Government also necessary in the case.

Mr. GILES observed that the object of his motion was not by any means to lessen the impediments in the way of a return to citizenship, but the reverse; he should therefore agree to the amendment of the gentleman from Connecticut. The motion was afterwards considered in several points of view, as blending State and Continental legislation, as interfering with the Legislative rights of the State by some, and as operating in the same manner in respect to the right reserved by the Constitution to the General Government, which is authorized to pass uniform laws of naturalization by others.

Mr. SEDGWICK having stated that his colleague had prepared a motion with regard to the kind of evidence that an applicant should exhibit of the goodness of his moral character and of his attachment to the Government, he requested Mr. GILES to withdraw his motion for the consideration of the other, which he did, and thereupon, Mr. DEXTER moved that no alien should be admitted to the rights of citizenship, but on the oath of two credible witnesses, that in their opinion he was of good moral character and attached to the welfare of this country, which motion was seconded by Mr. SEDGWICK, who added the following observations:

He said, that the subject under consideration was certainly of great importance, and opened an extensive field of discussion. The present motion, taken in conjunction with that already adopted, had for its object to embarrass the facility, with which aliens may be admitted to the rights of citizenship. He would submit to the consideration of the committee some of the leading ideas, which had occurred to his mind on this subject.

America, he said, if her political institutions should on experience be found to be wisely adjusted, and she shall improve her natural advantages, had opened to her view a more rich and glorious prospect than ever was presented to man. She had chosen for herself a Government which left to the citizen as great a portion of freedom as was consistent with a social compact. All benefited the preservation of this Government, in its purity, indispensable to the continuance of our happiness. The foundation on which it rested was general intelligence and public virtue; in other words, wisdom to discern, and patriotism to pursue the general good. He had pride, and he gloried in it, in believing his countrymen more wise and virtuous than any other people on earth; hence he believed them better qualified to administer and support a Republican Government. This character of Americans was the result of early education, aided indeed by the discipline of the Revolution. In that part of the country with which he was best acquainted, the education, manners, habits, and institutions, religious and civil, were Republican. The community was divided into corporations, in many respects resembling independent republics, of which almost every man, the qualifications were so small, was a member. They had many important and interesting concerns to transact. They appointed their executive officers, enacted bye laws, raised money for many purposes of use and ornament. Here, then, the citizens early acquired the habits of temperate discussion, patient reasoning, and a capacity of enduring contradiction. Here the means of education and instruction are instituted and maintained; public libraries are purchased and read; these are (said he) the proper schools for the education of Republican citizens; thus are to be planted the seeds of Republicanism. If you will cultivate the plants which are to be reared from these seeds, you will gather an abundant harvest of long continued prosperity.

Much information (he said) might be obtained by the experience of others, if, in despite of it, we were not determined to be guided only by a visionary theory. The ancient Republics of Greece and Rome (said he) see with what jealousy they guarded the rights of citizenship against adulteration by foreign mixture. The Swiss nation, (he said,) in modern times, had not been less jealous on the same subject. Indeed, no example could be found, in the history of man, to authorize the experiment which had been made by the United States. It seemed to have been adopted by universal practice as a maxim, that the Republican character was no way to be formed but by early education. In some instances, to form this character, those propensities which are generally considered as almost irresistible, were opposed and subdued. And shall we (he asked) alone adopt the rash theory, that the subjects of all Governments, Despotic, Monarchical, and Aristocratical, are, as soon as they set foot on American ground, qualified to participate in administering the sovereignty of our country? Shall we hold the benefits of American citizenship so cheap as to invite, nay, almost bribe, the discontented, the ambitious, and the avaricious of every country to accept them?

We had (he said) on this subject not only example, but warning. Will gentlemen (said Mr. S.) recollect the rage of ages which existed in the country from which we came, between the Saxon, Danish, and Norman emigrants and the natives of the country? The cruelties, the oppressions, the assassinations, in a word, the miseries to which this gave birth? Perhaps it might be said that in this instance the emigrants were hostile invaders; but the same events took place in the decline of the Roman empire, between the emigrants who were invited to occupy the vacant frontiers and the ancient inhabitants; although the former ought to have been united to the latter by every principle of affection and gratitude. By these and almost an infinity of other instances, it would not be rash to conclude, that by the undeviating principles of human nature, whenever the inhabitants of one country should be permitted to settle in another, by national affections, an union would be formed, unfriendly not only to the ancient inhabitants, but also to social order. Our own experience was not, he believed, in opposition to the general observation. Although this reasoning was to his mind conclusive against a general and indiscriminate admission of aliens to the rights of citizenship, yet he did not wish it should go to a complete exclusion.

It was said, in support of what was termed our liberal policy, that our country wanted commercial capital; that we had an immense tract of vacant territory; and that we ought not with the avarice of a miser, to engross to ourselves the exclusive enjoyment of our political treasures.

Mr. SENECA said he had never been convinced, that we ought to make so great a sacrifice of principle for the rapid accumulation of commercial capital. He had never been convinced that by an improvement of our own resources, it would not accumulate as fast as might be for the public benefit. We heard much of equality. Property was in some sense power; and the possession of immense property generated during passions which scorned equality, and with impatience endured the restraints of equal laws. Property was undoubtedly to be protected, as the only sure encouragement of industry, without which we should degenerate into savages. But he had never been convinced that the anxiety with which we wished an accumulation of capital in the hands of individuals, was founded on correct Republican reflection. The ardent ambition inspired by the possession of great wealth, and the power of gratifying it, which it conferred, had in many instances disturbed the public peace, and in not a few destroyed liberty.

The vacant lands which some with so much avidity wished to see in the occupation of foreigners, he considered as the best capital stock of the future enjoyment of Americans; as an antidote against the poison of luxury; as the nursery of robust and manly virtue, and as a preventive of a numerous class of citizens becoming indigent and therefore dependent. Whenever the time should arrive, (and may that period be very distant,) when there should no longer be presented to the poor a decent competence and independence, as the effect of industry and economy, (which would generally by the case when lands were no longer to be obtained, on their present easy and reasonable terms,) then that description of men, now perhaps the most happy and virtuous, would become miserable to themselves and a burden to the community. Now the man who entered on the stage of life, without property, had a reasonable assurance, that a few years of industry and economy, would give him independence, competence, and respectability. The prospect gave relish and effect to his labors. He planted himself on the frontiers, and cultivated in his posterity every useful and manly virtue. This was his treasure, and it was a glorious one.

Mr. S. said he considered America as in possession of a greater stock of enjoyment than any other people on earth. That it was our duty to husband it with care; yet he could not altogether exclude such virtuous individuals, as might fly here, as to an asylum against oppression. On the one hand, he would not dissipate our treasures with the thoughtless profusion of a prodigal; nor would he, on the other, board them, as in the unfeeling grasp of a miser. Our glorious fabric (said he) has been cemented by the richest blood of our country, and may it long continue to shelter us against the blasts of poverty, of anarchy, and of tyranny.

The present (Mr. S. said) he believed the most inauspicious time for the indiscriminate admission of aliens to the rights of citizenship. A war, the most cruel and dreadful which had been known for centuries, was now raging in all those countries from which emigrants were to be expected. The most fierce and unrelenting passions were engaged in a conflict, which shook to their foundations all the ancient political structures in Europe. This contest was supported on the one hand by men who believed personal political distinctions were necessary to the great purpose of security, and on the other by those who thought that society could be protected and individuals secured by a Government with departments, and without checks; neither embracing the principles established here, where, without privileged orders distinct portions of power were to be deposited in different hands, in such manner that it was almost impossible for the mind even to conceive that the different departments should form an union for any mischievous purpose; and altogether impossible to believe that without such concurrence either alone should be capable of executing any wicked design.

Could (he asked) any reasonable man believe, that men who, actuated by such passions, had fought on grounds so opposite, almost equally distant from the happy mean we had chosen, would here mingle in social affections with each other, or with us? That their passions and prejudices would subside as soon as they should set foot in America? or, that, possessing those passions and prejudices, they were qualified to make or to be made the governors of Americans?

He believed that the amendment now proposed by his colleague, in conjunction with that which had already succeeded, would on the one hand check the admission of foreigners in such numbers as might be dangerous to our political institutions; and, on the other, that it would not exclude such meritorious individuals as might be willing to serve the apprenticeship which might qualify them to assume the character and discharge the duties of American citizens.

He concluded by saying, that he had always been opposed to the policy of the Government on this subject; that his opposition had not been abated by reflection, but increased by the existing state of things in Europe.

The Committee now rose and reported progress.

TUESDAY, December 23.

An engrossed bill, authorizing the transfer of the stock standing to the credit of certain States, was read the third time and passed.

Mr. GREENUP, from the committee appointed to inquire if any, or what, alterations ought to be made to the act, passed the seventh day of June, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-four, entitled "An act concerning invalids," made a report; which was read, and ordered to a Committee of the Whole House to-morrow.

The House next went into a Committee of the Whole, Mr. CONN in the Chair, on the petition of Epaphras Jones, merchant, of New York. This petition respected a ship that had not been registered in due time, as an American bottom. The petition prayed for the remission of certain duties incurred in consequence of this neglect. After some discussion, wherein Mr. FITZSIMONS, Mr. GOODRICH, Mr. SWIFT, and Mr. GILBERT, spoke, the Committee rose; the Chairman reported progress, and asked leave to sit again. This was negatived, and the petition was referred back to the former committee.

A report was read, from the committee appointed, as to the distribution of the laws. It was ordered to be printed, and referred to a Committee of the Whole. The committee recommended that there should be printed three thousand copies, complete up to the end of the present session, of the laws; and an equal number in future. Part were to be printed in German. They were all to be distributed among the several States. Every printer of a newspaper in the United States, who can prove that he has printed the whole in his newspaper, is, at the end of each session, to receive the sum of — dollars of compensation. But this is not to be given to more than two printers in any one town.

The House proceeded to consider the report of the committee to whom were committed the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act to regulate the pay of the non-commissioned officers, musicians, and privates, of the Militia of the United States, when called into actual service, and for other purposes;" whereupon,

Resolved, That this House doth agree to the amendments proposed to be added to the end of the said bill, with an amendment.

Mr. BALDWIN, from the committee appointed to inquire how far the Post Office law has been carried into effect, made a report; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

PUBLIC DEBT.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the report of the committee appointed to prepare and report a plan for the reduction of the Public Debt.

Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, began by observing, that, having brought in the report which was under consideration, it might be expected that he should enter into some details, explanatory of the views of the select committee in making it. The subject was one which, from its being necessarily connected with numerical statements and dry calculations, would be likely to fatigue, were it not at the same time rendered highly interesting, by its immediate connection with the case and comforts of our constituents, and the credit and prosperity of our country. He should, therefore, with confidence, anticipate the attention of the Committee, while he developed the principles of the report, and pointed out the beneficial consequences which, in his estimation, would result from the adoption of it.

A proper consideration of the plan reported would lead to the following inquiries: 1st. What is the actual amount of the Debt? 2d. What will be the actual state of our revenue? 3d. What will probably be the state of our revenues for a series of years to come, excluding the casualty of war? 4th. Whether all the existing revenues ought to be kept in existence for a period commensurate with the existence of the Debt, or, if short of that period, for what length of time? 5th. What disposition ought to be made of any annual surplus of revenue which may exist, after satisfying the annual appropriations for the current expenditures, the interest of the Debt and the sum annually redeemable? 6th. Whether the sale of the Western lands ought at this time to be resorted to, as an auxiliary resource for the reduction of the Debt?

1st. The actual amount of the Debt Mr. S. stated to be as follows:

Total of six per cent. stock, when the whole shall be subscribed	$27,557,116
Six per cent. stock standing to the credit of certain States	2,345,056
Total of deferred stock	$29,902,172
Total of three per cents, about	14,951,036
Total of Domestic Debt	20,000,000
Total of Domestic Debt	$64,853,208

Of the above sum, it was necessary to remark, that about $2,500,000 still remained in the shape of registered and unsubscribed Debt, the greatest part of which it was presumable would soon be subscribed; and that the sum of $2,265,023 was now the property of the Sinking Fund, subject, nevertheless, to redemption, on the same terms as the remainder of the Debt.

Such being the state of the Debt, and the Government having reserved, by the law which modified it, a right to redeem it by payments not exceeding in each year the sum of eight dollars on every hundred dollars of the six per cent stock, for principal and interest, it would be seen that, stating the six per cent. at $24,902,172, the two per cent. on account of principal, which the Government has the right to pay, will be the sum of $598,043; which sum, with the interest annually liberated thereby, will be sufficient to meet the annual instalments, according to the right reserved, until the year 1801, when the further sum of $299,021, being the two per cent. on the deferred Debt, must be provided for the annual payment of that two per cent., besides the sum of $897,062, as an annual provision for the interest, which will then become payable thereon. Some calculations would be hereafter exhibited to show the operation of these payments on account of the principal of the Debt, and the length of time requisite for the complete discharge of the whole of the six per cent., and deferred Debt.

2d. The second consideration was, the state of our resources.

After a survey of the state of our burdens—a picture which, however unavoidable, and the necessary price of our liberties, was still an unpleasant one—it must be highly gratifying to every patriotic eye, to survey the interesting picture which the present state of our revenues exhibited. The beauty of this picture was considerably heightened by contrasting it with the gloomy scenes displayed in the Old World, where the great and powerful nations of Europe were heaping burden upon burden on their distressed subjects, and exhausting their resources and their strength in a conflict the most bloody and obstinate that history had recorded, while this happy country, under the auspices of peace and the smiles of Providence, was increasing in its population, its commerce, and its strength, in a progression which outran all calculation.

At the close of the year 1793, there existed a surplus of revenue beyond the appropriations of $2,487,181.

At the close of the present year, 1794, notwithstanding the extraordinary and heavy expenditures of this year, for the building of frigates, fortifications, purchase of military stores, and the expensive supplies for the Western Army under General Wayne, a surplus is stated of $845,425.

At the close of the year 1795, the probable surplus is estimated at $700,000; after discharging out of the revenues of that year the enormous sum of $1,122,569, for the expense of the army employed to suppress the rebellion in Pennsylvania, in addition to a heavy expense for the regular Military and Naval Establishments, and a further sum for fortifications.

While we exult, said Mr. S., at this flourishing aspect of our affairs, ought we to withhold our gratitude from those to whose steady policy and judicious arrangements our country is in no small degree indebted for such blessings? He was happy, for one, to avail himself of this opportunity, while he gloried, as an American, in the unparalleled prosperity of his country, to tender his small tribute of approbation to those who had contributed, by their firmness and wisdom, to preserve the peace of our country, and to fill the coffers of our Treasury, by an excellent system of administration. To the President, who had, at a most critical period, by his magnanimous conduct, stemmed a torrent which was hurrying us away to a destructive war, and to the Secretary of the Treasury, whose unremitting and assiduous labors had given energy and system to the complex machinery of an extensive and intricate Department, (and to whose fidelity and services a large committee of this House had borne testimony at the last session,) he felt that much was due, and thus feeling, he could not on this occasion suppress the sentiments he had expressed.

It is evident, said Mr. S., from the above view of our revenue, and the appropriations to which it is subject, that there will be a surplus adequate to the discharge of the instalment which the Government has the right to redeem in the year 1795.

3d. The next subject of inquiry is, whether the state of our revenues for a series of years will be likely to enable the Government to continue the regular and gradual discharge of the future instalments?

A view of this part of the subject must exclude altogether the idea of a foreign war, for all must agree that such a national calamity would at the same time dry up the sources of some of our best revenues, and divert others from those channels in which they would, in times of peace, flow for the beneficial purposes of reducing the Debt: a war, while it would necessarily interrupt the payment of the existing Debt, would as certainly create a new one, proportioned to the nature and duration of such war. Our calculations must therefore be predicated on a state of peace, and God forbid, said Mr. S., that we may ever have to make them on any other hypothesis?

The existing revenues arise from the following sources, and are estimated, in round numbers, at the following sums, viz:

Import and tonnage	$5,500,000
Excise	400,000
Carriage tax	$150,000
Snuff and sugar tax	90,000
Auction tax	40,000
Licenses for retailing wines, &c.	100,000
Surplus of dividend on Bank stock and Post Office	380,000
	70,000
	$6,350,000

The charges which will probably exist for a series of years, may be estimated as follows, viz:

Civil List	$500,000
Interest on Foreign and Domestic Debt	$1,100,000
Military Establishment, including pensions	1,500,000

Naval Establishment, including pensions	400,000
Interest on temporary loans	100,000
Light-house establishments	24,000
	5,624,000
Surplus	726,000
	$6,350,000

The result of the above comparative view of our permanent revenues and expenditures, which is obviously to a certain extent conjectural, exhibits a surplus of above seven hundred thousand dollars, which will furnish more than the requisite sum for the annual redemption, until the year 1801, when, as already shown, further sums will be wanted, to meet the deferred Debt.

With respect to the above statement of our revenues and expenses, the following observations occur: 1st. With respect to our revenues—The impost and tonnage are estimated to produce the sum of $5,500,000; but this calculation, I understand, is bottomed on the imports of the present year, which, it has been suggested to me by persons of commercial knowledge, greatly exceeds the ordinary importations, and are attributable to the prodigious emigrations to this country, which are likely to be diminished when peace takes place, and therefore likely to cause a diminution hereafter of this branch of revenue. Should this suggestion be well founded, and the revenue from impost be reduced, the defalcation will be probably counteracted by a proportional increase of the product of the internal duties, some of which have hitherto yielded much less than they ought to have done, from obstructions which are every day lessening, and others are of too recent a date to furnish a guide to an accurate estimate of their ultimate product. We may reasonably hope that the latter as well as the former will ere long yield a much larger sum than that at which they are estimated. 2d. With respect to the expenditures: The only prospect of a favorable alteration in that estimate arises from the Military Establishment, a reduction of which, to any considerable extent, would be a handsome addition to the surplus. But this is more to be hoped than expected. The precarious situation of our extensive frontiers, will, for some time, preclude every rational expectation of any considerable diminution of the Army; and, even should it take place, it is not improbable that a part of the savings in that respect may be required for Indian presents, and trading houses, for the preservation of peace. So in regard to the annual Naval Establishment, which is estimated at four hundred thousand dollars; the savings which a reduction of that establishment would produce, would necessarily be diverted to the payment of an Algerine tribute. We ought not, therefore, to reckon on much more than the annual surplus above stated, for several years to come. Events will determine, in the year 1801, when the interest on the deferred Debt shall become payable, whether any further revenues will be then wanted for that purpose. The next subject of inquiry, is, 3d, Whether all the present revenues ought to be kept in existence for a period commensurate with the Debt, or if short of that period, what ought to be the term of their duration? On this point we must anticipate a diversity of sentiment in the Committee. It will probably be said, that as the laws of last session, imposing duties on certain internal objects, were merely experimental, and therefore limited in their duration to the term of two years, it would be inexpedient at this time to forestall a judgment of their utility and operation, and to repeal the clauses of limitation before we had an opportunity of judging of their effects on our constituents; that there is a prospect of the revenues arising from impost and tonnage, and from distilled spirits, being hereafter adequate, by their future increase, and by a probable reduction of our permanent expenses, to a full provision for all necessary objects, without the aid of these new resources; and that, at any rate, it ought to be left to the Legislature which may exist at the epoch when those laws shall expire, to judge of the fitness of a continuance of them, or of a substitution of other taxes, should further taxes be necessary; that we should, at this session, content ourselves with furnishing the means for the instalment of the ensuing year, and leave it to our successors, of whose zeal we ought to entertain no doubts, to do their duty, as we shall have done ours.

To remove the weight of these objections, two points must be investigated; 1st. Whether the revenues arising from impost and tonnage, and from distilled spirits, will alone be competent to the permanent expenses of the Union, and the regular discharge of the Debt? 2d. Whether, admitting the necessity of further resources, those of last session, arising from internal objects, are not the most likely to meet the general approbation of the country?

1st. Some remarks already made apply to the first point, and elucidate the inadequacy of the duties arising from impost and tonnage, and from distilled spirits, to the payment of our annual expenses and the regular discharge of the Debt. This point will be more clearly ascertained by stating that the aggregate product of those revenues is estimated at $5,900,000, whereas the permanent expenditures, and the sum annually redeemable of the Debt, amount to $6,224,000, leaving a deficiency of $324,000, which must be supplied by other taxes. It must be further observed, that this statement does not look beyond the end of the year 1800, for the year 1801 will call for much further revenues; an annual provision must then be made for the interest on the deferred Debt, and another provision for the redemption of the capital; the former, as before stated, will require the sum of $897,062, and the latter the sum of $299,021, making together $1,196,083. Hence it is demonstrable that there will be, without the aid of the new internal taxes, an annual deficiency, until the end of the year 1800, of $324,000, and an annual deficiency after the year 1800 of $1,520,083.

To these authentic statements, it is no answer to say that the other revenues may be increased, and that the permanent expenditure may in future years be diminished to such extent, as to obviate a recurrence to further aids. With an equal share of the prophetic gift, I have as much right to say that the former may be diminished, and the latter may be augmented to such extent as to increase the deficiency. But even admitting the hypothesis of an increment of revenue and a diminution of expense, is there no valuable object to which any occasional surplus may be applied? Would not the application of it to the Sinking Fund be attended with the most advantageous consequences? Would not the annual purchase of the Debt greatly accelerate the extinguishment of that curse, as it has been so emphatically called, that scourge of nations, that parent of excises, the horror of a free people, that rallying point of the factions, that vital nourishment of the clubs, the standard of the anarchist, and bug-bear of the ignorant? Shall we trifle with such a foe, when we have in our hands the means to subdue him? Shall we throw over this monster only a flimsy net-work which he will break through in a few years, when we have the power to chain him down forever? Shall we administer only tampering medicines for this great State malady, as it has been termed, when we can perform a radical cure? Shall we exhibit ourselves as State empirics playing mountebank tricks with this deep-rooted distemper, this cancer on the body politic, when we hold the proper remedy to extirpate it? Shall we be mere dabblers in a matter of so much lasting importance to the energy and prosperity of the nation? No, sir, let us seize with ardor on this occasion, let us with avidity embrace the opportunity which a kind Providence, and the wisdom of our public administrators, has afforded us, of striking at the root of this national evil; let us improve all the means which the virtuous acquiescence of our fellow-citizens has set before us, to liberate our country from a Debt, which, though honorable in its origin, wise in its modification, and just in its principles, cramps our natural energy, enfeebles our means of defence, and absorbs those resources which, with proper application, would render us at all times a valuable ally and a formidable enemy. Let us avail ourselves of the present era of peace and prosperity, to lay a solid foundation for our future grandeur. A few years more of such times, and we shall have so far cut down that Debt, which now exhausts one-half of our revenues, as to be enabled, with the existing taxes, to equip a considerable fleet, to be fortified against any invasion, and to have a military strength which will set at defiance any nation which may be so rash as to quarrel with us. It is therefore no less our interest than our duty to make at this time a serious and a great effort to diminish the Debt, and to establish a permanent system for that salutary object. There can be little doubt, that, in so doing, we shall anticipate the sanguine expectations and cordial wishes of our fellow-citizens throughout the Union. The President has expressed the same sentiment; the House indeed, seemed to be under a similar impression, when they unanimously acceded to the proposition which I had the honor to make at the beginning of the session, and which was, that "Further provision ought to be made for the reduction of the Public Debt; and, that a committee be appointed to report a plan for that purpose." The House, in directing the Committee to report a plan, undoubtedly meant something, not temporary and annual, but systematic and permanent. A plan excludes the idea of an annual or biennial arrangement; it contemplates an arrangement unfluctuating and durable. Any modification therefore of the Debt which would be exposed to change and instability, would be as repugnant to the unanimous vote of the House, as already expressed, as to the wishes and feelings of our constituents.

No further argument being, it is presumed, necessary to evince the expediency of drawing into our coffers other revenues than those arising from commerce and from distilled spirits, I proceed to the second consideration. 2d. Whether the duties and taxes imposed at the last session on internal objects, be not preferable to any others?

Those duties and taxes are, on manufactured sugar and snuff, on carriages, on licenses for retailing wines and foreign spirituous liquors, and on sales at auction, the duration of which is limited to the end of the session of Congress, subsequent to the month of June, 1796. From the various objects of taxation which presented themselves, these were at the last session selected by a committee composed of a member from each State; they were, after a full discussion, agreed to by large majorities in both Houses; they have been in operation many months, and no complaint has yet reached our ears; Congress have been in session near two months, and no petition has appeared against them, no motion for the repeal of any of them. To these indirect evidences of their propriety, it may be added, that they carry with them direct testimony of their merits; they are paid by those classes of the community who can well afford it; they are simple, easy and cheap in their collection: there are no other taxes which can be recommended by so many considerations; they are as popular as taxes can be; were they less so than I believe they are, the application of them to so popular an object will undoubtedly make them as much so as we can desire; if there should be any sting in any of them, the consideration of the good they will do, will remove it.

To what other source shall we apply? The impost is at its ne plus ultra; this is universally agreed: Stretch the cord again, and I predict that it will snap. The excise on distilled spirits is not proposed to be raised; shall we lay a land tax? Unless we wish to excite a general clamor throughout this country, that subject ought not to be meddled with; let it remain as our grand resource in case of war, when dire necessity shall compel a resort to it, and when Americans will submit to it with cheerfulness.

Impressed with the solidity of these considerations, the Select Committee have recommended a continuance of these taxes to the year 1801. It would perhaps have been expedient to have proposed a permanent appropriation of them until the extinguishment of the Debt; a spirit of conciliation induced a compromise which fixed on that epoch, when the Deferred Debt becomes payable, and when the Legislature will decide from the then state of things, whether those or other revenues shall be requisite. Anxious as I am, that no difficulties may hereafter interrupt the completion of this desirable work, my own opinion is, that these taxes should now be permanently appropriated to the redemption of the Debt, not liable to be repealed, unless others of equal value shall be substituted. The Committee will decide whether I am right in this opinion, or whether their duration ought to be limited to a period when they will probably be still more necessary than at present.

5th. As to the disposition of any annual surplus. The Select Committee have reported that the surplus of revenue which may hereafter exist, after satisfying all legal appropriations, ought to be annually appropriated to the purchase of the Public Debt.

We may entertain a reasonable expectation, that, in times of public tranquility, and without the intervention of any unfortunate contingency, the existing revenues will in some years, perhaps in every year, yield an overplus after discharging the current demands and the redeemable part of the Debt; that overplus will be advantageously employed in buying up the Debt. This appropriation may be made in two modes, either by now declaring by law that such surplus, at the end of every year, shall be applied to the purchase of the Debt, unless the same shall be required for the public exigencies, and be specially appropriated thereto by act of Congress (of which kind of appropriation there is a precedent in our statute books,) or by recommending it by a resolution of this House to future Houses, to make such annual appropriations. The first mode appears the most efficacious and systematic.

With this auxiliary fund, a considerable impression on the Debt may be annually made by purchases; already the interest fund, arising from interest money liberated by antecedent purchases and payments into the Treasury, amounts to the annual sum of 77,164 dollars; this fund being applied, as fast as it passes into the hands of the Commissioners, to further purchases, is annually augmenting, with all the velocity of compound interest; the accretion of the annual surpluses will still add to its celerity; the operation therefore, of the Sinking Fund, will form a valuable aid to the redemption fund. Both these funds will be annually performing their operations; the redemption fund will annually discharge that part of the principal of the six per cents, redeemable by law, even when the Debt is above par; the Sinking Fund will buy it up on beneficial terms when under par, besides operating on the three per cents and deferred.

6th. The last point relates to the Western lands, for the sale of which the Committee have recommended a provision at the present session.

On that subject, it may not be amiss to remark, that much doubt is entertained by judicious men, whether this is the proper season for proceeding to the sale of those lands.

On the one hand, it is suggested that the present state of war in that country would either impede the sale or render it unprofitable; that Congress ought therefore, to take no steps in regard to that property, until a settled and lasting peace shall have been established. On the other hand, the prospect of an approaching peace and the present rage for land speculation seem to invite to the experiment. If adventurers are disposed to purchase, notwithstanding the war, on terms advantageous to the United States, there appeared no good reasons why the Government should not, as early as possible, avail itself of this auxiliary resource to reduce its Debt. The purchasers in this case run all risks, and take upon themselves all hazards; the Government has no other care than either to sell for ready money or to have the contracts well secured. Should it be thought however that any sales, prior to a peace, will be disadvantageous to the United States, it will in that case be proper to introduce in the bill a clause declaring that the sales shall not commence until the President shall by proclamation, have announced a peace with the Indian tribes. Mr. S. then said, having thus, Mr. Chairman, touched on the different points resulting from the report, and on the subjects incident to a due consideration of it, I shall conclude with a few miscellaneous observations, not immediately falling under any of the above heads. Though they will be more obvious and applicable when the details of the bill shall come under consideration, yet it may not be altogether useless to draw the attention of the Committee to them at this time.

1st. The first consideration which occurs as a matter of detail, is the doubt whether the payment of two per cent. on the principal of the Debt is to extend to that portion of six per cent. stock which has been purchased by the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund? It appears to me expedient that it should: in that case, the amount so paid must be appropriated to the Sinking Fund; and the interest liberated by each annual payment, must go to swell the payment of the ensuing year, for it will be observed that, according to the right reserved, each annual payment on account of principal, will be larger than the payment of the preceding year, by the addition of the interest liberated in that year: by the existing laws, the interest on the Debt purchased is appropriated to the Sinking Fund; a repeal of that appropriation will therefore be necessary.

2d. The next consideration which arises is, by whom shall these payments of redemption be made? The Commissioners of the Sinking Fund present themselves as the most proper persons. The moneys requisite for the purpose will be placed at their disposal, by the proper officers of the Treasury. They will keep two separate accounts, one relating to the redemption of the Debt by annual payments, the other relating to the purchase of the Debt.

3d. Some difficulties may be suggested on the score of the certificates.

Are new certificates to be issued at every annual payment? Or, are the payments to be endorsed or noted on the certificates, or only entered on the books of the Treasury in each creditor's account?

How is a purchaser to know the value of a certificate, and what steps ought to be adopted in relation to certificates in Europe? It may be expedient to vest a discretionary power in the Treasury Department, subject to the control of the President, to regulate these details in the manner most convenient to the creditors, consistent, however, with a due regard to the Treasury arrangements.

4th. Another point, of no less doubt and of equal importance with the foregoing will arise, i. e. whether the two per cent. on account of principal shall be made quarterly yearly or annually; this doubt will require Legislative decision. The advantage of paying it quarterly will be, that it will prevent the collection of large sums at the end of the year in the Treasury; but, as no interest in that case will be stopped till the end of the year, expediency dictates that the payment of the two per cent. should be made at the end of each year. Mr. SMITH concluded, with observing, that, from the calculations which he held in his hand, it appeared that, from the mere operation of the Redemption Fund, the present six per cent. Debt would be paid off in less than 29 years, and the deferred in less than 29; there would then remain only the three per cent. and Foreign Debt; but the combined operation of the Sinking Fund would greatly accelerate the discharge of the whole, and should the Legislature think proper to increase our revenues by new taxes, we might soon expect to see a complete discharge of the Debt. At all events, said Mr. S., it will be a consolation to us all as we grow old, that the older we grow the nearer we approach that happy period, when our country, liberated from its burdens, shall rise with a vigor and elasticity which will protect our liberties from every external aggression, and preserve to us, and perpetuate to our posterity, every internal blessing.

Mr. NICHOLAS, Mr. DEXTER, Mr. HULLHOUSE, and Mr. FRIZZMONS, also spoke. The Committee then rose, and leave was granted for them to sit again.

WEDNESDAY, December 24.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Northern boundary of the Territory ceded to the United States by the State of North Carolina; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported progress.

On the question, that the House will, on Friday next, again resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the said bill, it passed in the negative.

Ordered, That the Committee of the Whole House be discharged from the further consideration of the said bill.

Mr. SEDGWICK, from the committee appointed to inquire and report the means of providing for the payment of the third instalment due on a Loan made of the Bank of the United States; and for the payment of any instalments which may fall due on Foreign Loans in the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-five, made a report; which was read, and ordered to be committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Friday next.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the report of the committee appointed to prepare and report a plan for the reduction of the Public Debt; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose, and reported progress.

FRIDAY, December 26.

Two other members, to wit, JEREMIAH WADSWORTH, from Connecticut, and SAMUEL SMITH, from Maryland, appeared, and took their seats in the House.

A petition of William and Archibald McNeil, of Boston, in the State of Massachusetts, ropemakers, was presented to the House and read, praying a remission of the duties accruing on a quantity of hemp and yarns imported in the brig Betsey, in the month of November, 1793, which was consumed by fire, together with other property of the petitioners, on the 30th day of July last.

Ordered, That the said petition be referred to Mr. VENABLE, Mr. SCOTT, and Mr. CLAIBORNE; that they do examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their opinion thereupon, to the House.

Mr. HULLHOUSE, from the committee appointed, presented a bill for the ascertainment of certain losses of the officers of Government and other citizens, by the insurgents in the Western counties of Pennsylvania, and providing some present relief to the sufferers; which was read twice, and committed.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House, on the report of the committee appointed to inquire and report the means of providing for the payment of the third instalment due on a Loan made of the Bank of the United States, and for the payment of any instalments which may fall due on Foreign Loans, in the year 1795; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose, and reported the following resolution, which was twice read, and agreed to by the House, viz:

Resolved, That provision be made, by law, for the payment of any instalments of Foreign Loans which may fall due in the year 1795; and for the payment of the third instalment due on a Loan made of the Bank of the United States, out of the proceeds of any Foreign Loans heretofore made.

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in pursuant to the said resolution, and that Mr. SEDGWICK, Mr. GILES, and Mr. IRVING, do prepare and bring in the same.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have disagreed to the amendment of this House to the amendment proposed by the Senate to be added to the end of the bill, entitled "An act to regulate the pay of the non-commissioned officers, musicians, and privates, of the Militia of the United States, when called into actual service, and for other purposes," and do insist on their amendment to the said bill. They desire a conference with this House on the subject-matter of the said amendment, and have appointed managers at the same on their part.

The House proceeded to consider so much of the said message as desires a conference with this House on the subject-matter of the amendments depending between the two Houses to the said bill. Whereupon,

Resolved, That this House doth agree to the said conference, and that Mr. MADISON, Mr. DEARBORN, and Mr. DAYTON, be appointed managers at the same on the part of this House.

Mr. SEDGWICK, from the committee appointed, presented a bill providing for the payment of certain instalments of Foreign Debts, and of the third instalment due on a Loan made of the Bank of the United States; which was read twice, and committed.

NATURALIZATION BILL.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House, on the bill to amend the act, entitled "An act to establish an uniform rule of naturalization."

Mr. GILES proposed to amend the intended test of a citizen, by adding, after "two witnesses giving evidence as to his moral character," these words: "attached to a Republican form of Government." He thought this test proper, to prevent those poisonous communications from Europe, of which gentlemen were so much afraid.

Mr. DEXTER preferred saying "attached to the Constitution of the United States."

To this amendment Mr. GILES had little or no objection.

Mr. BOUNDINOT did not see the use of either amendment. It was only giving unnecessary trouble. The oath which the person himself must take, was sufficient for expressing his fidelity to the Government of this country.

Mr. NICHOLAS considered both the amendment, and the clause to which it was annexed, as unnecessary; and even if in themselves proper, they were misplaced. He thought both equally superfluous. They should have been inserted in the oath of allegiance of the man himself.

Mr. DAYTON hoped that the whole clause would be rejected. He should be against it, unless the nature of the evidence was referred to a Court of Justice. He foresaw many difficulties arising to poor men in attempting to get two such witnesses. It might suit extremely well with merchants and men of large capital, who had, he supposed, been alluded to the other day, under the title of meritorious emigrants. He was not so anxious for them as for useful laboring people, who, as he thought, would be more likely to do good. This class, however, had never, it was likely, troubled their heads about forms of Government. He further objected to the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia, that the word Republican was entirely equivocal. This title was assumed by many Governments in Europe, which were upon principles entirely different from ours. Some of them, such as Poland, had been Aristocracies of the most hideous form.

Mr. DEXTER hoped that the amendment of Mr. GILES would not pass, [Mr. GILES had, as before noticed, consented to withdraw it]; not so much for the sake of the principle, as of the language in which it was expressed. The word Republican implied so much, that nobody could tell where to limit it. Why use so hackneyed a word? Many call themselves Republican, who, by this word, mean, pulling down every establishment: they were mere Anarchists.

Mr. HULLHOUSE was equally against the clause and amendment. Mr. DEXTER and Mr. GILES previously declared themselves extremely doubtful whether they should even vote for the clause, when amended in their own way.

Mr. GILES felt himself extremely surprised to hear it asserted on the floor of Congress, that the words "Republican form of Government" meant anything or nothing. He read a passage from the Constitution, whereby a Republican form of Government is guaranteed to each of the United States composing the Union. He should, therefore, have imagined, that the words were well understood from one end of the Continent to the other. He did not expect such criticism. He was not sure if he should vote for the clause at all; but if he did so, he should wish the best to be made of it. He then altered his amendment to these words: "attached to the principles of the Government of the United States."

Mr. DAYTON.—With all the ambition of that gentleman [Mr. GILES] to be called a Democrat, both he and Mr. D. would more properly be called Republicans. He again vindicated his assertion as to the equivocal meaning of the word. A Venetian or Genoese might come to this country, and take the oath as proposed, and then excuse himself by saying, "it was the Republican form of my own country which I had in view." One of the best writers on the British Constitution had called that also a Republic.

Mr. MADISON was of opinion that the word was well enough understood to signify a free Representative Government, deriving its authority from the people, and calculated for their benefit; and thus far the amendment of his colleague was sufficiently proper. Mr. M. doubted whether he himself should, however, vote for the clause, thus amended. It would perhaps be very difficult for many citizens to find two reputable witnesses, who could swear to the purity of their principles for three years back. Many useful and virtuous members of the community may be thrown into the greatest difficulties, by such a procedure. In three years time a person may have shifted his residence from one end of the Continent to the other. How then was he to find evidence of his behaviour during such a length of time? But he objected to both amendments on a different ground. It was hard to make a man swear that he preferred the Constitution of the United States, or to give any general opinion, because he may, in his own private judgment, think Monarchy or Aristocracy better, and yet be honestly determined to support this Government as he finds it.

Mr. HILLHOUSE then proposed as an amendment, to insert, that "evidence should be produced to the satisfaction of the Court."

Mr. DEXTER mentioned the abuses that have happened in the present form of admitting citizens. He did not comprehend the argument of Mr. DAYTON, that it would be more easy for a rich man for a poor man to get evidences to swear to his having resided in the country. If he had not, the fact was of a notorious nature. It would likewise be as easy for a poor man, as for a rich one, to get an attestation of his character. The point of residence was, in itself, but little. A man may have resided here for a long time, and defrauded the citizens, which would be no recommendation.

Several other gentlemen spoke. The resolution finally passed.

The second resolution produced a long conversation, in the course of which Mr. MURRAY declared, that he was quite indifferent if not fifty emigrants came into this Continent in a year's time. It would be unjust to hinder them, but impolitic to encourage them. He was afraid that, coming from a quarter of the world so full of disorder and corruption, they might contaminate the purity and simplicity of the American character.

The Committee now rose, and had leave to sit again.

MONDAY, December 29.

A petition of Nehemiah Somes, of the town of Boston, in the State of Massachusetts, was presented to the House and read, praying a remission of the duties accruing on a quantity of salt, which he imported in the ship George, from Lyndington, in the Kingdom of Great Britain, and was consumed, together with the store-houses in which it was deposited, by a late fire in the said town.

Ordered, That the said petition be referred to Mr. VENABLE, Mr. SCOTT, and Mr. CLAIRBORNE; that they do examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their opinion thereupon, to the House.

A memorial of sundry manufacturers of tobacco, in the city of Philadelphia, whose names are thereunto subscribed, was presented to the House and read, praying a revision of the excise laws of the United States, and that so much of the act passed at the last session of Congress, entitled "An act laying certain duties upon snuff and refined sugar," as imposes a duty on manufactured tobacco, may be repealed.

Ordered, That the said memorial be referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the report of the committee appointed to prepare and report a plan for the reduction of the Public Debt.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting an account of the Receipts and Expenditures of the United States for the year 1793, and accompanied with an explanatory letter to him from the Comtroller of the Treasury; which were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. GOODRICH from the committee appointed, presented a bill making further provision in cases of drawbacks; which was read twice, and committed.

Mr. GILES, from the committee appointed to prepare and report a plan for the better organizing, arming, and disciplining, the Militia of the United States, made a report; which was read, and ordered to be committed to a Committee of the Whole House to-morrow.

Mr. MADISON, from the managers appointed on the part of this House to attend the conference with the Senate, on the subject-matter of the amendments depending between the two Houses to the bill, entitled "An act to regulate the pay of the non-commissioned officers, musicians, and privates, of the Militia of the United States, when called into actual service, and for other purposes," made a report; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate recede from their amendment, disagreed to by this House, and insisted on by the Senate, to the bill, entitled "An act to regulate the pay of the non-commissioned officers, musicians, and privates, of the Militia of the United States, when called into actual service, and for other purposes;" and do agree to the said amendment, with an amendment and modification of the same, agreeably to the report of the Joint Committee of Conference.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Report from the Secretary of War, respecting the frigates authorized by the act "to provide a Naval armament," made pursuant to the order of the President of the UNITED STATES, conformably to the resolution of the 16th instant; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. GOODRICH, from the committee appointed, presented a bill supplementary to the several acts imposing duties on goods, wares, and merchandise, imported into the United States; which was read twice, and committed.

Mr. BLOUNT, from the committee to whom were committed the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of Government, for the year 1795," made a report. Whereupon, Resolved, That this House doth agree to the said amendments.

THE PUBLIC DEBT.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House, on the bill providing for the payment of certain instalments of Foreign Debts, and of the third instalment due on a Loan made of the Bank of the United States.

[A report was read from a committee, respecting a demand made on account of the Bank of the United States. The particulars were briefly thus: Fifty thousand four hundred dollars belonging to the public were brought by sea from North Carolina to this city, and the Bank of the United States had been employed by the Secretary of the Treasury to insure them. This was done as to the whole sum, excepting some hundreds of dollars, and reasons were assigned why the insurance could not be immediately completed. In a very short time news came that the ship was cast away, and the money thrown overboard. The question now was—Who should pay the small sum not covered by the insurance, and the premium of that greater part, which was insured? The whole demand was about fourteen hundred dollars. The officers of the Treasury considered the claim of the Bank as fair, and they accordingly examined and paid it; but, it was next necessary to come forward in the House, and get a particular act to indemnify themselves for having done so. These particulars are the substance of a statement made on this subject to the House, by Mr. GROVE.]

Mr. MADISON had no objection to the reasonableness of the claim; he only apprehended that a special appropriation was needless.

Mr. FITZSIMONS said, there was no doubt that the thing was not authorized by any act already made. The matter was nothing to the Bank, as the account had already been settled by the officers of the Treasury. He said that the insurance was not to be got on money at any time, as being liable to so many accidents. In the present case, for example, the underwriters did not believe that the money was really thrown into the sea. But the Captain had gone through the requisite formalities, and no more was to be got of him.

Mr. GROVE differed entirely both from Mr. MADISON and Mr. FITZSIMONS, in their opinion that no law existed by which the Treasurer of the United States was authorized to pay this money. Was he not authorized to bring this money from North Carolina? Did not this imply that he was warranted to be at the expense of insuring it? Did it not follow that he must pay for insurance, as other people did? And, as a natural consequence from these premises, it followed, that if by an accident not imputable to him a part of the sum was not covered by the underwriters, the loss must ultimately fall on the State. The Treasurer was surely warranted to act thus, and as surely entitled to reimbursement in the terms now demanded.

Mr. DAYTON had once employed a friend to insure property which was coming by sea to him. Had this friend omitted to do so, he asked whether he would have had a claim, either in law or justice, or in any other way, to make this friend responsible for the value of this property, if it had been shipwrecked and not insured? Certainly not. No more had the Government any right to retort upon the Bank, because a part, though indeed a very small one, of this money, was uncovered. Mr. D. understood very well the nature of the doubt started by Mr. MADISON, and, as he understood him, he was of that gentleman's opinion. If the fifty thousand dollars had been to come from Carolina by land, put the case, that the Secretary of the Treasury had hired wagons to bring it, and a guard to protect it: After the wagons and the guard had been paid for and dismissed, will it be said that the House was at liberty to refuse reimbursing what they cost? This he thought a parallel case.

Mr. BLOUNT, Mr. MADISON, and Mr. W. SMITH, spoke each a few words. The House agreed to the report of the Select Committee.

NATURALIZATION BILL.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House, on the bill to amend the act, entitled "An act to establish a uniform rule of naturalization."

The motion before the Committee, made by Mr. VENABLE, when they broke off the last discussion, had been to strike the word "moral" out of this amendment: "good moral character." These three words, altogether, were an addition of what was to be attested by the witnesses for a candidate to admission as a citizen.

Mr. DEXTER opened the debate on the amendment of Mr. VENABLE to the amendment, by saying that he wished to hear the reasons for it.

Mr. NICHOLAS said, that he did not make the motion; but his colleague, who had made it, thought that the insertion of the word "moral" gave too strict an air to the sentence. This word might be hereafter implied to mean something relative to religious opinions.

Mr. SEDGWICK remarked, that if no better reason than that advanced by Mr. NICHOLAS could be given for striking out the word "moral," he could not agree to it. Moral is opposed to immoral, but has no particular reference whatever to religion, or whether a man believes anything or nothing. It has no reference to religious opinions. We can everywhere tell, by the common voice of the World, whether a man is moral or not in his life, without difficulty. In some States of the Union adultery is not punishable by law, yet it is everywhere said to be an immoral action. It is too nice to make a distinction between a good character and a good moral character. The word good, itself, is very equivocal in its meaning. It signifies anything, everything, or nothing. A good companion is one thing; a good man, as applied to wealth, conveys a different sense; and so on.

Mr. B. BOWEN considered the amendment itself, and the motion of Mr. VENABLE to strike out the word "moral," as equally useless.

Mr. MURRAY hoped that the word would not be struck out. This would be the greatest slander ever cast upon the American character. It would excite the surprise of foreign nations.

Mr. VENABLE had thought the wording of the phrase too strict; but rather than have any further dispute, he withdrew his motion for striking out the word "moral."

The clause was then read, as amended. Mr. GILBERT thought that the term of residence, before admitting aliens, ought to be very much longer than mentioned in the bill. The Chairman informed him that the term in the bill was left blank.

Mr. SEDGWICK, agreed to the idea of Mr. GILBERT. He wished that a method could be found of permitting aliens to possess and transmit property, without, at the same time, giving them a right to vote. He did not know if the Constitution authorized such a thing.

After some further conversation, the clause passed. The third resolution in the report was then read; which was, that if an American citizen chose to expatriate himself, he should not be allowed to enter into the list of citizens again without a special act of Congress, and of the State from which he had gone.

Mr. MADISON did not think that Congress, by the Constitution, had any authority to readmit American citizens at all. It was only granted to them to admit aliens.

Mr. SEDGWICK was very willing for his part, that citizens who had once expatriated themselves should never be readmitted again.

The Committee, on two successive motions to that effect, from Mr. MADISON and Mr. GILES, rose. The Chairman reported progress, and asked leave to sit again, which was granted.

TUESDAY, December 30.

An engrossed bill providing for the payment of certain instalments of Foreign Debts, and of the third instalment due on a Loan made of the Bank of the United States, was read the third time, and passed.

A petition of Robert Crabb, of Amelia township, in the State of South Carolina, was presented and read, praying that he may be permitted to fund a certificate for a certain sum of money which he deposited in the Treasury of the State of Georgia, in the month of May, 1783, and which, from unavoidable circumstances, has not been funded within the time prescribed by law.

Ordered, That the said petition be referred to the Committee of Claims.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

Gentlemen of the Senate, and of the House of Representatives:

I lay before you a Report made to me by the Secretary of War, respecting the frontiers of the United States. The disorders, and the great expenses which incessantly arise upon the frontiers, are of a nature and magnitude to excite the most serious considerations.

I feel a confidence that Congress will devise such Constitutional and efficient measures, as shall be equal to the great objects of preserving our Treaties with the Indian tribes, and of affording an adequate protection to our frontiers.

G. WASHINGTON.

UNITED STATES, December 30, 1794.

The said Message and report were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The House proceeded to consider the amendment and modification proposed by the Senate to the amendment of this House, in lieu of their amendment, disagreed to by this House, and insisted on by the Senate, to the bill, entitled "An act to regulate the pay of the non-commissioned officers, musicians, and privates, of the Militia of the United States, when called into actual service, and for other purposes." Whereupon,

Resolved, That this House doth agree to the said amendment and modification.

NATURALIZATION BILL.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House, on the bill to amend the act, entitled "An act to establish a uniform rule of naturalization."

Mr. HILLHOUSE moved as an amendment to the clause before the Committee, that if any citizen of the United States, at any time thereafter, should become a citizen or subject of any other State or country, he should not again be admitted an American citizen. This amendment gave rise to debate.

Mr. MURRAY hoped the amendment would succeed, and that any citizen of the United States who, when out of the United States, elected to be a subject of any foreign Power, should not again be permitted to the rights of complete citizenship; nor did he think it necessary to decide the question which had resulted from the ingenious arguments of his friend from Massachusetts, [Mr. DEXTER] whether a man can expatriate himself without the express consent of the community or nation of which he is a citizen or subject. It was enough for us to say, that any man who does expatriate himself from the United States, shall not again become a citizen. He could not agree with the gentleman from Massachusetts, in the position, that a man cannot expatriate without the consent of his country. The practice of this country is a direct confutation of this doctrine; and it must be admitted, either that this country has trampled on the most solemn of social and national rights, by its practice, or that a man may leave his country and take on him the obligations of a new allegiance in this country.

It seemed to him a position as conformable to sound morals as to political truth, that what a man has no right to offer, another man, or society, cannot rightfully accept. He would infer, that this country had a right to naturalize foreigners, because she has naturalized them; and that this country, by its laws, having accepted the allegiance of an alien, the alien had a right to offer that allegiance. The very proviso to naturalize an alien, without inquiry as to the consent of his own country having been previously obtained, seems to be predicated on the principle, for which he contended—that a man has the right to expatriate himself without leave obtained: if he has not, all our laws of this sort, by which we convert an alien into a citizen completely, must be acknowledged to be a violation of the rights of nations. How far a man, after having been naturalized at a period of life when his reason enabled him to choose, and to enter into a solemn obligation, and after he has expressly entered into it, has a right, without the consent of the society, to quit that society, might be another question. After a citizen throws off his allegiance to this country, by leaving it and entering into a new obligation to some other nation, though he may have a right so to do, he has no right to return to his allegiance here without the consent of this society; and it is not a question of right, but of policy, how far we will readmit him to citizenship. When he said that the right of dissolving allegiance must be admitted both to give exercise to a right and to give consistency to our principles and practice, he did not mean that a citizen could throw off his allegiance in this country, but that he must complete the act of dissolution in some other country. Such a principle would belong to the theory of the dissolution, rather than the formation of a civil society; hence appeared to him the strange solecism of that law of Virginia which provides for the throwing off allegiance within the community. The consequences of such a principle are not only destructive to the very form and body of civil society, but are unnatural. They present a civilized being belonging to no civil society on earth; for, in the intermediate state in which he stands, between the allegiance and country he has just disowned, and the allegiance and country to which he may intend to pledge himself, he is in the imaginary state of nature, which is, in reality, an unnatural state, for a being whose every faculty and quality constitutes him a moral agent, surrounded by essential relations, and, of course, impel him to discharge duties of a social nature.

He wished this Government, while it expressly adopted the right of naturalizing aliens, to do and to say nothing that involved a contradiction between its principles and practice. If it accepts the allegiance of an alien, it presupposes that the alien has the right to tender his allegiance; and one clause of the bill expressly requires of the alien an abjuration of his former allegiance, which is certainly proper. In doing this, the bill admits, unequivocally, the right of subjects and citizens to expatriate. The British Government, by a want of conformity between their first principle, as laid down in their law books, and the practice of Parliament, have shown us a singular mixture of old principles which the nation have outgrown.

It is a maxim with them, that allegiance cannot be dissolved by any change of time or place, nor by the oath of a subject to any foreign Power; yet they naturalize by act of Parliament. They accept what they declare by their theory of civil law cannot be rightfully offered: nay, for one century the throne of England has presented Monarchs who were foreigners. William of Orange was a Prince, but he was a subject, too, of a foreign Power; and George the First was a member of the Germanic body. There is little danger that citizens, who are worthy of being so, will throw off their allegiance from the United States. The amendment which prohibits their readmission to a participation of all the rights of citizenship, will be a sufficient penalty, if any be necessary. Though they may have a right to expatriate themselves, there cannot be inferred a right of returning; for every body politic must have the right of saying upon what terms they will accept any addition of aliens to their numbers; and the expatriated man, no longer belonging to this society, and being an alien, the Government may choose whether he ever shall enjoy its privileges again.

Mr. BALDWIN expressed the strongest disapprobation at the idea of expatriating all those of our citizens who may have become subjects or citizens of another country. Many of them had been made citizens without any solicitation of their own, and merely as a mark of esteem from the Government under which they lived. They had no design whatever of renouncing their country. Yet the House, all at once, declares them incapable of returning to their former situation.

The amendment was negatived. The Committee rose, the Chairman reported progress, and the House adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, December 31.

LEMUEL BENTON, from South Carolina, appeared and took his seat in the House.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from the Secretary of War covering sundry petitions; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Report from the Secretary of War, accompanying statements received since the twenty-ninth day of March last, in the cases of claimants to be placed on the pension list of the United States, who have obtained certificates from the Judges of the Circuit Courts, signed as Commissioners, and from the Judge of the District of Maine; which were read, and ordered to be referred to the Committee of Claims.

NATURALIZATION BILL.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill to amend the act, entitled "An act to establish a uniform rule of naturalization."

Mr. W. SMITH made a motion for striking out the clause under consideration altogether, and leaving exactly as it now stands the law regarding citizens of America, who became citizens of other countries. This was rejected.

After some further discussion, Mr. GILES proposed a new clause, which was in substance, that all such aliens, who had borne any hereditary titles, or titles of nobility in other countries, should make a renunciation of such titles before they can enjoy any right of citizenship. This renunciation is to be made in the Court where they lay claim to a right of citizenship. Mr. G. said, if we did anything to prevent an improper mixture of foreigners with the Americans, this measure seemed to him one that might be useful.

Mr. W. SMITH was entirely opposed to the motion. An attempt of this kind had been made some years ago in the Legislature of one of the States, but dropped again as having been seen to be improper. The mind of the public is completely guarded against the introduction of titles, and they will never be current here. You cannot hinder a man from calling another a Viscount. You cannot declare this a crime.

Mr. S. doubted whether the House had, by the Constitution, any right of making such a law. They were directed not to grant any titles, but their authority did not extend to the taking away of titles from persons who were not born in the country. The Marquis de LAFAYETTE has been distinguished all over the Continent by the title of Marquis. Mr. S. hoped that he would one day be again in America, and then he would very likely be called Marquis again. By this law it would be illegal. The member then went into a long detail on English nobility, and explained the difference between several kinds of titles.

Mr. GILES did not think his motion positively necessary, but it might be useful. It seemed to be a growing practice with some gentlemen in the House to treat the most serious subjects with ridicule. He, for his own part, considered this conduct as highly improper.

Mr. DEXTER was as averse to titles as any man in the House, but he did not like to make laws against them. An alien might as well be obliged to make a renunciation of his connexions with the Jacobin club. The one was fully as abhorrent to the Constitution as the other.

Mr. PACE highly recommended the motion of his colleague. He mentioned a particular occasion at New York, where the word honorable had been applied in Congress to a particular body. He had proposed to strike out this word honorable. He was ridiculed, but he stood to his point, and carried it by a great majority. If the Marquis LAFAYETTE was to return to America, he would behave with the frank manners which became a Republican. The case might be very different with a British Peer with his star and garter, and other baubles of that sort. If he were called My Lord Duke, or My Lord, or any other of these foolish names, it might tickle the ears of some people, and make them like the custom.

Mr. GILES, in reply to Mr. DEXTER, said, that if a thing be implied in the Constitution, where is the harm of expressing it? This is said to be implied in the Constitution, and therefore it is needless to express it. Now this was one of the very best arguments which could be thought of in favor of the motion. At the time when the Constitution was made, nobody could foresee the strange turn which affairs have taken, or that there might be a danger from an inundation of titled fugitives. Indeed, if no better reasoning could be adduced against his motion than that employed by the gentleman from South Carolina, he was not likely to think the worse of it. That gentleman had objected to the adoption of the motion because it agrees with the public mind. He says that the dispositions of the people will of themselves be sufficient to exclude the use of titles. It was certainly no reason against making a law in Congress, that it would exactly meet the wishes of the people. The motion might be useful. Mr. G. hoped that it would pass. Foreigners coming here with titles never will voluntarily renounce them. Mr. G. reminded the House that his proposal went only to the renunciation of titles, when the party concerned wanted to become a citizen.

Mr. W. SMITH said, that the fact was against the gentleman. Foreigners coming to this country had renounced their titles, and called themselves only by their plain names. Why might there not be an interdiction against persons connected with the Jacobin club? Why not forbid the wearing of certain badges of distinction used by Jacobins?

Mr. MADISON approved of the motion. He regarded it as exactly to the business in hand, to exclude all persons from citizenship who would not renounce forever their connexion with titles of nobility. The propriety of the thing would be illustrated by this reflection, that if any titled Orders had existed in America before the Revolution, they would infallibly have been abolished by it.

Mr. GILES said, that the debate had turned upon these people called Jacobins. Both these and the persons with titles were dangerous to the country. Some of the former part of the regulations in this proposed act had an eye to them. He would have more faith in an individual who came forward in an open Court and renounced his connexions with nobility. He was willing to withdraw for the present his motion.

The Committee went through the bill and rose, and the Chairman reported it with the amendments.

THURSDAY, January 1, 1795.

The SPEAKER laid before the House two letters, one from URIAH FORREST, one of the members for the State of Maryland, dated the twenty-fourth ultimo, stating the election of Benjamin Edwards, as a member of this House, in his stead, he having resigned to the Executive of the said State of Maryland; the other, from John Kilty, Clerk of the Council of the said State, dated the twenty-seventh ultimo, addressed to the said Benjamin Edwards, informing him that an attested certificate of his election as a Representative for the said State, in the room of the said Uriah Forrest, had, by order of the Council of the said State, been transmitted to the SPEAKER of the House of Representatives; which letters were read, and ordered to be referred to the Committee of Elections, with instruction to withdraw, and report presently thereon.

Mr. DARTON, from the Committee of Elections, to whom were referred the letters from Uriah Forrest and John Kilty, Clerk of the Council of the State of Maryland, made a report; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

GOVERNMENT SALARIES.

Mr. CLAIBORNE said, that he had long waited for some other gentleman to bring forward the very important proposition which at length devolved upon his hands. He was not unapprised that it would draw down upon him the contempt, and perhaps the calumny too, of many. But the consolation of having honestly done his duty, and what the interest of his country demanded, buoyed him above a sordid concern for the malicious reproaches of those whose private and personal interests alone were affected by his proposition, and from whom alone he might expect to be attacked. A thorough conviction of the proprity of it would be a sufficient salvo for even a dis-appointment, and would enable him to meet, with composure and firmness, all the heavy artillery of oratory that might be levelled against him. This proposition was intended to redress the greatest and best founded complaints against the Government, viz.: exorbitant salaries to Congress, and the Executive officers of Government. He was more anxious about the success of this proposition than about any sentiments which might be entertained respecting the motives that had brought it forward, for it was reduced almost to a system to suspect gentlemen of sinister views, who advance propositions respecting pecuniary matters. Those who share the honors must be content to share the hardships of war. With these impressions, he begged leave to lay the following motion on the table. He had intended that it should be more comprehensive, but his hands were tied by the Constitution.

Resolved, That a committee ought to be appointed to bring in a bill, or bills, to amend the act entitled an act for establishing the salaries of the Executive officers of Government, and their assistants and clerks; and an act for allowing compensation to the members of the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States, and to the officers of both Houses, and to reduce all such salaries, as, in the opinion of the said committee, will bear reducing."

The resolution was ordered to lie on the table.

NATURALIZATION BILL.

The House proceeded to consider the amendments reported yesterday from the Committee of the Whole House, to the bill to amend the act, entitled "An act to establish a uniform rule of naturalization."

Several gentlemen spoke on this subject. As to the granting of privileges to aliens, Mr. MADISON remarked, that there was no class of emigrants from whom so much was to be apprehended as those who should obtain property in shipping. Much greater mischief was to be feared from them than from any influence in votes at an election. If he were disposed to make any distinction of one class of emigrants more than another, as to the length of time before they should be admitted citizens, it would be as to the mercantile people—as these persons may, by possessing themselves of American shipping and seamen, be enabled clandestinely to favor such particular nations in the way of trade as they may think proper.

The House went through the report of the Committee, and agreed to the amendments.

Mr. GILES then rose to make his promised motion as to the exclusion of any foreign emigrant from citizenship who had borne a title of nobility in Europe till he had formally renounced it. He proceeded to observe that, agreeably to the spirit of the Constitution, we ought to have the strongest possible evidence that people of this description have renounced all pretence to a right of this nature, before we admit them into the bosom of society. Moderation had been recommended. He requested gentlemen to observe that he conducted his motion on the strictest principles of moderation. He had, in a former part of this bill, voted for some clauses which were intended to guard the Government against any disturbance from the people called Jacobins, when their principles should run to a dangerous and seditious extreme. The same spirit of candor and moderation which had induced him to vote for a precaution against the attempts of the one party, now led him to propose a precaution against the prejudices of the aristocrats, which were, upon the whole, more hostile to the spirit of the American Constitution than those of their antagonists. He also requested gentlemen to observe that his present motion went not to the invasion of any positive right. It left the individual exactly where it found him, unless he aspired to be an American citizen. Otherwise, he might retain his titles undisturbed as long as he pleased. But if he wanted any promotion of a civil nature in this country, he must rise to it by conforming exactly to the rules laid down by the Constitution itself. That code had declared no titled character admissible to any civil rank. It was not to be supposed that people born and nurtured in the lap of aristocracy would heartily renounce their titles, and become all at once sincere Republicans. It was therefore highly improper that such people should be admitted. If we are allowed to anticipate probabilities, it seems highly probable that we shall soon have a great number of this kind of persons here. A revolution is now going onward, to which there is nothing similar in history. A large portion of Europe has already declared against titles, and where the innovations are to stop, no man can presume to guess. There is at present no law in the United States by which a foreigner can be hindered from voting at elections, or even from coming into this House; and if a great number of these fugitive nobility come over, they may soon acquire considerable influence. The tone of thinking may insensibly change in the course of a few years, and no person can say how far such a matter may spread. After these, and other prefatory remarks, Mr. G. read a resolution, which was in effect as follows:

"And in case any alien applying for admission to citizenship of the United States, shall have borne any title or order of nobility in any Kingdom or State from whence he may come, he must renounce all pretensions to his title before the Court in which such application shall be made; and this renunciation must be registered in said Court."

Mr. G. observed that previous to the late Revolution the French nobility were, by the lowest calculation, rated at twenty thousand; and as we may conclude on France being successful, a great proportion of these people may be finally expected here.

Mr. DEXTER declared that he was not very anxious against the resolution. He, however, opposed it. He imagined that, by the same mode of reasoning, we might hinder his Holiness the Pope from coming into this country. He entered at some length into the ridicule of certain tenets in the Roman Catholic religion, and said that priestcraft had done more mischief than aristocracy.

Mr. MADISON said that the question was not perhaps so important as some gentlemen supposed; nor of so little consequence as others seem to think it. It is very probable that the spirit of Republicanism will pervade a great part of Europe. It is hard to guess what numbers of titled characters may, by such an event, be thrown out of that part of the world. What can be more reasonable than that when crowds of them come here, they should be forced to renounce everything contrary to the spirit of the Constitution. He did not approve the ridicule attempted to be thrown out on the Roman Catholics. In their religion there was nothing inconsistent with the purest Republicanism. In Switzerland about one-half of the Cantons were of the Roman Catholic persuasion. Some of the most Democratical Cantons were so; Cantons where every man gave his vote for a Representative. Americans had no right to ridicule Catholics. They had, many of them, proved good citizens during the Revolution. As to hereditary titles, they were proscribed by the Constitution. He would not wish to have a citizen who refused such an oath.

Mr. PAGE was for the motion of his colleague. It did not become that House to be afraid of introducing Democratical principles. Titles only give a particular class of men a right to be insolent, and another class a pretence to be mean and cringing. The principle will come in by degrees, and produce mischievous effects here as well as elsewhere. If such men do come here, nothing can be more grateful to a Republican than to see them renounce their titles. This does not amount to any demand of making them renounce their principles. If they do not aspire to be citizens, they may assume as many titles as they think fit. Equality is the basis of good order and society, whereas titles turn everything wrong. Mr. P. said that a scavenger was as necessary to the health of a city, as any one of its magistrates. It was proper, therefore, not to lose sight of equalities, and to prevent, as far as possible, any opportunities of being insolent. He did not want to see a Duke come here, and contest an election for Congress with a citizen.

Mr. SEDGWICK was really at a loss to see what end this motion could answer. He agreed with the arguments of Mr. GILES. But the point in view was explicitly provided for already. By taking an oath of citizenship the individual not only renounces, but solemnly abjures nobility. The title is destroyed when the allegiance is broken by his oath being taken to this Government. This abjuration has destroyed all connexion with the old Government. Why then provide for it a second time?

Mr. GILES said, that by admitting a thing to have been once done, it was admitted that it might be done again. If it had been right to do it once, there could be no harm in repeating it. The member then quoted Mr. DEXTER, who rose and declared that the gentleman had misunderstood stood him. He spoke for some time, and when he sat down—

Mr. GILES declared himself incapable of comprehending whether Mr. DEXTER was for his motion or against it. He therefore proceeded to reply to Mr. SEDGWICK, whose chief argument had been that the thing was provided for already. He did not suppose that this gentleman would allege the matter to be explicitly provided for. It only could be so by implication; which was a very bad way of making a law, because it gave room for endless disputes. If the thing is in itself right, why refuse to vote directly for it? Why leave it only to be implied? He wished to let foreigners know expressly the ground upon which they stood. Why not tell them at once, and in plain English, you must renounce your titles before you can have the privileges of an American citizen? Mr. G. pressed home this idea more than once. He meant no act of inhospitality to these emigrants. He would deprive them of no right, nor do anything unkind to them. But he was entitled by the spirit of the Constitution to withhold this right from them till they renounced all hereditary titles. This was no incivility. He concluded, by declaring that he would, if supported, call for the yeas and nays on this question. A number of members rose to support this proposal.

Mr. NICHOLS had no objection to the motion, but that it did not go far enough. The emigrants ought to be obliged to swear not only that they abjured all titles hitherto received, but that they would never accept of any in future. He believed that this would hurt their feelings, and, sympathizing with them, he would not urge a proposal that might add to their distress, but should vote for the motion as it stood.

Mr. LEE was very sorry that the present subject had been so long agitated—he never viewed it as important—but a degree of importance had been now given to it by the calling of the yeas and nays.

Under these circumstances, it appeared to him very well calculated to impress on the public mind, that there was a real danger of the establishment of nobility or aristocratic orders in this country; and that those who voted against this motion were friendly to such a change in our political system; and that those who voted for it were the only true patriots. He trusted so much to the liberality of the mover as to rely that he neither meant unnecessarily to alarm the public mind, nor intended to inflict a stigma on those gentlemen who, entertaining an opinion of the frivolity and inefficacy of the motion, should vote against it. Mr. LEE would therefore impute the motion to the most laudable zeal to guard the public liberty. And on this ground it would be necessary to inquire what was the danger which existed that this provision was intended to protect us from. The gentleman must have felt great alarm, or he would not have introduced it. Mr. L. said, when he looked through the Constitution and Laws of the United States, and particularly when he considered the Constitutions and laws of the respective States, that he could not see the shadow of a foundation to build an alarm upon. As to mere empty names, as to sounds, we must be very corrupt, we must be very ignorant, if we could be alarmed by them. And in this free country every man had a right to call himself by what name or title he pleased; and if the mover thought proper to change his name for any other name, sound, or title, it would neither add to, nor diminish his real worth and importance; it would not give qualities to his heart which he had not before, nor detract from those he had. What were the mischiefs experienced in Europe from privileged orders? they did not flow from the names by which those orders were distinguished; they arose from the exclusive preference and privileges which those orders possessed in political rights, and in property. Without these their titles would have been mere empty gewgaws, ridiculous in the extreme, and unworthy of the acceptance of any man of common sense. Titles then did not produce the mischiefs; but the privileges annexed to titles. Mr. L. had said, in this country every man had a right to call himself by what name or title he pleased; but here no mischiefs could result from it, because neither political rank nor property could be attached to titles.

Every citizen was equal to his fellow-citizen in political rights; and the laws of the respective States had wisely provided that property could not be accumulated in such a degree in the hands of individuals as to give them an improper influence in society. By the equal distribution of estates individuals are prevented from being so rich as to trample upon the necks of their equals. Great accumulations of property are more likely in fact to introduce the effects of aristocracy than the ridiculous names by which individuals may be distinguished. It was a slander upon the fundamental laws and political institutions of our country, to suppose that a few aliens, because they had possessed titles in foreign countries after having renounced their allegiance to those countries, even if they were disposed to do it, could as it were by magic, overturn the established habits of our people, and the liberty of the Government into which they had incorporated themselves. The body of our citizens were too enlightened, too virtuous, for Mr. L. to apprehend any danger from so trivial a cause. If worthy citizens were so corruptible, and so easily corrupted, we must relinquish the idea of ever being fit to maintain a free and Republican Government. But our citizens can distinguish between sound and reality. When we passed the excise law, it was said that the name was odious; but the Legislature, having a proper confidence in the understanding of the community, did not hesitate to pass it; because it was a just and necessary one. If nobility should ever unfortunately be introduced into this country (to which at present every circumstance is hostile, and which Mr. L. believed impossible, as long as we adhere to our present fundamental laws and virtuous habits) it would be from internal corruption, and not because a few foreigners, who once possessed titles in their native countries, may become citizens of this. They in fact can have no privilege among us in consequence of any foreign title; but must exist in perfect equality in all social rights with the rest of our citizens.

But his colleague objected to the qualities of their hearts. To find out the heart of any man, would be a difficult task. We are liable to be deceived by every description of men. The professions of over-zealous patriots do not always secure us from their treason, or we should not so frequently in history read of Catinas and Cæsars, or lately have witnessed the tyranny of Robespierre. All these men were once flaming patriots. And if zealous patriots can turn traitors and tyrants, was it not as possible for the member of a foreign privileged order to become a good citizen? The truth is, professions and abjurations are no certain proofs of the virtue and apprehended patriotism of any man. We are secure from the danger, because every citizen here is equal. No privileged orders exist amongst us, nor can exist, unless the people shall choose to change their present Constitution and Laws, which is not to be expected. Mr. L. said, if he understood his colleague, his strongest reason why a foreign nobleman could not become a good citizen, was the education he had received; the superiority which he had been accustomed to exercise over his fellow men, and the servile court he had been accustomed to receive from them. It was, then, the corrupting relation of lord and vassal, which rendered him an unfit member of an equal Republican Government. Mr. L. feared that this reasoning applied to the existing relation of master and slave in the Southern country, (rather a more degrading one than even that of lord and vassal) would go to prove that the people of that country were not qualified to be members of our free Republican Government. But he knew that this was not the case. Though in that House the members from the State of Virginia held persons in bondage, he was sure that their hearts glowed with a zeal as warm for the equal rights and happiness of men, as gentlemen from other parts of the Union where such degrading distinctions did not exist. He rejoiced, that, notwithstanding the unfavorable circumstances of his country in this respect, the virtue of his fellow-citizens shone forth equal to that of any other part of the nation.

Mr. L. was afraid that the force of his colleague's reasoning might be extended to throw an improper imputation on the virtue of his countrymen, which he was sure could not be intended. But, Mr. L. did not think that the citizens in the South had any right to assume a superiority in political virtue, over their fellow-citizens to the East. He claimed to be equal, not to be behind them was sufficient glory. Mr. L. did not know but the proposition, if it had any effect, which he very much doubted, might collaterally affect the rights to property, which, in the course of time, might devolve to aliens in the countries from which they came, which, he believed, his colleague could not intend. In fine, Mr. L. said, until the yeas and nays were called he had received the proposition as perfectly unimportant and frivolous. The calling of the yeas and nays had in his mind given it some importance. He believed that it was calculated, but he trusted that it was not intended, to spread an alarm—a false alarm—that Aristocracy was coming to swallow us up, and to hold up certain gentlemen who had opposed it as friends to such a system. Under such impressions, though he was personally very indifferent whether it was agreed to or not, he felt it his duty to vote against it; not being willing to countenance any measure by which groundless and unjust alarms, jealousy and suspicions, might be excited, and viewing it as gatory in the extreme.

Mr. SCOTT was sorry that so much time had been spent on the motion. We are not by the Constitution authorized to make titles; and he apprehended that if it was unlawful to manufacture a commodity at home, it was unlawful to import it from abroad. On this account he was for the resolution. If once we allow the thing to be manufactured at all, he had no doubt but titles would be as prevalent here as in Britain. He should think it very odd to see a man sitting opposite to him in that House, with a star and garter on his breast. The emigrant was as welcome to wear them as to wear his hat. Only let him wear them out of doors.

Mr. TRACY thought that more time had been spent upon the subject than it was worth. He mentioned the proceedings of the French Convention, who, sometime before they cut off the head of the Duke of Orleans, debated four days upon what name they should give him, and at last called him Egalité. He feared that calling for the yeas and nays thus early would look like party, as if intended to cast an odium on gentlemen who should vote against the motion.

Mr. DEXTER would vote for the resolution, if the gentleman would agree to an amendment; which was, that he renounced all possession of slaves.

Mr. THATCHER moved as a second amendment, "and that he never will possess them."

The words of Mr. DEXTER's amendment were nearly these: "And also, in case any such alien shall hold any person in slavery, he shall renounce it, and declare that he holds all men free and equal."

Mr. GILES said, that he should begin to think his motion of very peculiar importance, if such extraordinary resources were adopted to dispossess of in that House. He understood this to be intended as a hint against members from the Southern States. It had no proper connexion with the subject before the House. He had therefore no scruple in voting against it. It was calculated to injure the property of gentlemen. As to slavery, he lamented and detested it; but, from the existing state of the country, it was impossible at present to help it. He himself owned slaves. He regretted that he did so, and if any member could point out a way in which he could be properly freed from that situation, he should rejoice in it. The thing was reducing as fast as could prudently be done. He believed that slavery was infinitely more deprecated in countries, where it actually existed, and consequently where its evils were known, than in other countries where it was only an object of conversation. Gentlemen had objected to calling for the yeas and nays. Have not the public a right to know the sentiments of the House on every question? Was it any unusual thing to call for the yeas and nays? Or was there any use for it but that the sentiments of every member might be known?

Mr. MADISON mentioned regulations adopted in Virginia for gradually reducing the number of slaves. None were allowed to be imported into the State. The operation of reducing the number of slaves was going on as quickly as possible. The mention of such a thing in the House had in the mean time a very bad effect on that species of property, otherwise he did not know but what he should have voted for the amendment of Mr. DEXTER. It had a dangerous tendency on the minds of these unfortunate people.

Mr. NICHOLAS said, that Mr. DEXTER had more than on one occasion hinted his opinion that possessors of slaves were unfit to hold any Legislative trust in a Republican Government. He was solicitous that before Mr. D. spoke on a subject, he would make himself in some degree acquainted with it. He ought to acquire some information as to the state of the country, otherwise his opinion would fall into contempt with those who knew it. Mr. N. said, that gentlemen who possessed a thousand slaves in Virginia had no more influence on their neighbor who had not one than that neighbor had on them.

Mr. DEXTER complained of the attempt to take the yeas and nays, as a design to hold up certain people to public odium. He would withdraw his amendment if the gentleman would withdraw his motion.

Mr. HEATH was unwilling to impute any uncandid motives to gentlemen, but he thought this introduction of slavery as at best highly improper. He read a clause of the Constitution prohibitory of proposing an abolition for many years to come. He then asked how gentlemen, in the face of an express article of the Constitution, could propose an amendment like that of Mr. DEXTER.

Mr. SEDGWICK rose in some warmth. He said that there was no design in calling for the yeas and nays but to fix a stigma upon gentlemen in that House as friends to a nobility, when they were no such thing, and to raise a popular odium against them. To propose an abolition of slavery in this country would be the height of madness. Here the slaves are, and here they must remain.

A question of adjournment was now carried by 43 against 29. So the motion of Mr. GILES stands over till to-morrow.

FRIDAY, January 2.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from the Governor of the State of Maryland, enclosing a return of the election of Benjamin

Edwards, to serve as one of the members of this House for the said State, in the room of Uriah Forrest, who has resigned his seat; as, also, a Letter from the said Uriah Forrest to the said Governor of Maryland, dated the eighth day of November last, stating his resignation; which were read, and ordered to be referred to the Committee of Elections.

Mr. DAYTON, from the committee of Elections, to whom was recommittees their report of yesterday on the letters from Uriah Forrest and John Kilty, Clerk of the Council of the State of Maryland, and to whom was, this day, referred the Letter from the Governor of Maryland, with its enclosures, made a report; which was read as follows:

"That it appears, from a certificate signed by the Governor of the State of Maryland, in Council, and under the seal of the said State, that Benjamin Edwards was duly elected to serve in the House of Representatives of the United States, in the place of Uriah Forrest, who had resigned his seat.

"That the resignation of Uriah Forrest satisfactorily appears from his Letter of the twenty-fourth of December, directed to the Speaker of the House of Representatives.

"Resolved, That, in the opinion of the committee, Benjamin Edwards is entitled to take a seat in the House, as one of the Representatives for the State of Maryland, in the room of Uriah Forrest."

The said resolution was again read, and, on the question put thereupon, agreed to by the House.

Mr. EDWARDS then appeared, and the oath to support the Constitution of the United States being administered to him by Mr. SPEAKER, he took his seat in the House as one of the Representatives for the State of Maryland, in the room of Uriah Forrest.

NATURALIZATION BILL.

The House resumed the consideration of the amendments reported on Wednesday last from the Committee of the Whole House to the bill to amend the act entitled "An act to establish a uniform rule of naturalization." Whereupon,

The amendment moved yesterday to the said bill being under consideration, in the words following, to wit:

"And in case any such alien applying for admission to become a citizen of the United States, shall have borne any hereditary title, or been of any of the orders of nobility in the Kingdom or State from which he came, in addition to the requisites of this, and the before recited act, he shall make an express renunciation of his title, or order of nobility, in the Court to which his application shall be made, before he shall be entitled to such admission; which renunciation shall be recorded in the said Court."

A motion was made and seconded to amend the said amendment, by adding to the end thereof the words following to wit:

"And, also, in case such alien shall, at the time of his application, hold any person in slavery, he shall in the same manner renounce all right and claim to hold such person in slavery."

On the question that the House do agree to the said amendment to the amendment, Mr. BOURNE said he was against both amendments. He saw no use either for the one or the other. He recapitulated the numerous checks which the Constitution had framed against nobility getting into it. He, therefore, with all these checks, could see no danger from it. So much for the expediency of the proposal. He next considered it in a different point of view. A foreigner comes, perhaps with a title, which he has derived from a long train of ancestors, and, with a very pardonable infirmity, he is fond, he is perhaps proud, of this badge of nobility. Is it polite, is it generous, to force him to renounce it? If it is an hereditary title, he can renounce only for himself. His children still inherit the right. Mr. B. wished both amendments withdrawn.

Mr. RUTHERFORD said, the people of America had an exceeding aversion to the bubble of nobility. He had so much confidence in the wisdom, good sense, and public spirit of the gentlemen in this House, that he was sure the amendment would be carried by a very great majority. He was equally certain that the amendment of the other gentleman [Mr. DEXTER] would be rejected. It went to wound the feelings and alienate the affections of six or eight States in the Union. He was against the yeas and nays. He wished for a silent vote.

Mr. McDOWELL.—When the gentleman from Massachusetts first brought forward the motion on the table, Mr. McD. could not think he was sincere, from the idea which he had formed of the candor and good sense of that gentleman. But, much to his surprise, Mr. D. persisted in supporting the propriety of his motion, which is not only an indirect attack on the State Governments, but even on the Constitution of the United States, and on the members of this House who represent the Southern States. This amendment not only tends to irritate the minds of members, but of thousands of the good citizens in the Southern States, as it affects the property which they have acquired by their industry. Thus it cools their affections towards the Government, as they will find that one part of the Government is about to operate on their property in an indirect way. The gentleman dare not come directly forward, and tell the House, that men who possess slaves are unfit for holding an office under a Republican Government. Mr. McD. recalled to the mind of the House the conduct of the people that compose the Southern States, during the late war, and their struggle for American Independence. He then bade the House review the behaviour of their Representatives, under the present Government, and say whether they do not partake more of the Republican spirit than the members from the Eastern States. The latter, also, no doubt had members who did honor to the States which they represented, and to the United States. He thought the amendment of Mr. DEXTER partook more of monarchical or despot principles than any thing which he had seen for some time. What right had the House to say to a particular class of people, you shall not have that kind of property which other people have? This was the language of the motion, and he considered it as highly unjust. Mr. McD. wished the gentleman to consider what might be the consequence of his motion, at this time, when the West Indies are transformed into an immense scene of slaughter. When thousands of people had been massacred, and thousands had fled for refuge to this country, when the proprietors of slaves in this country could only keep them in peace with the utmost difficulty, was this a time for such inflammatory motions? He was amazed that a gentleman of whom he had so high an opinion, could, for a moment, embrace an idea, which was, in all points of view, so extremely improper and dangerous.

Mr. DEXTER chiefly excused his motion because the other gentlemen had been for taking the yeas and nays. The tenor of his argument seemed to be this: You want to hold us up to the public as aristocrats. I, as a retaliation, will hold you up to the same public as dealers in slaves. Mr. D., however, did not wish to irritate. He for that reason, withdrew his motion, under the hope that the yeas and nays would not be taken.

Mr. GILES said, that no person could be more anxious than himself to conciliate. But he could not submit to purchase conciliation by sacrificing his opinion, or betraying his duty. He should, on that account, stand by his amendment. It had been said that he called for the yeas and nays for the purpose of holding up to popular detestation a certain party in that House. Such an idea had never entered into his mind. He then commenced a vindication of the propriety of his amendment against the observations of Mr. BOURNE, who had, among other things, alleged that it had no proper relation to the spirit of the Naturalization Bill. After defending it, on this quarter, Mr. G. proceeded to answer something that had been alleged yesterday against his amendment. This was that it had been calculated to hold up an idea to the world, that there was a party in that House in favor of Aristocracy. If there is no such party, a general vote for the amendment will prove that this report is without foundation. In reality, there is no connexion between the amendment and any such scheme. The idea must have been in the head of the member himself. It is not the amendment, but the use which the gentleman makes of it, that can have any tendency that way. Mr. G. never could have thought of such a way of holding up a party. As to the amendment of Mr. DEXTER, he, Mr. G., held property sacred, and never could have consented to prohibit the emigrant nobility from having slaves any more than other people. But as for titles of nobility, they were quite a different thing. They were but a name, and people were not obliged even to give them up, unless they wanted to become American citizens. As the call of yeas and nays had given such uncommon uneasiness, he, for his own part, should give it up. He was careless how the vote was taken. The other gentlemen who supported his call might act for themselves.

Mr. LEE said, he hoped that to-day the question would have been taken without further debate; he had no disposition to say any thing more on it; and should have remained silent if his colleague [Mr. GILES] had not made some strictures on the observations which fell from him on the preceding day.

Mr. L. repeated, that he had not viewed the motion of any importance till the yeas and nays were called—that in itself it could do no good. He maintained, however, that, under its present aspect, it was well calculated to alarm the public mind about a danger that did not, and could not, exist, under the circumstances of our country; and that particularly to-day, it had more the appearance of an engine to exalt the patriotism of some gentlemen, and throw an unjust odium on others. He did not mean to say that this was the design of it. But it being nugatory in itself, and the danger against which it was said to guard us, being too ridiculous to excite a momentary apprehension in the minds of our enlightened fellow citizens, it wore too much such an appearance. Under this view, Mr. L. thought it looked too much like that spirit of denunciation, which his colleague so greatly lamented on a late occasion—self-created societies—a spirit that was calculated to engender the violent and rancorous passions of the human heart in this House, and scatter them through the community. A spirit which, if indulged, might arm in hostility and hatred to each other, the two ends of this Continent, and produce consequences fatal to the peace and prosperity of both.

Mr. L. always thought the Eastern and Southern States were well situated to unite on terms of the greatest reciprocal benefit. That, for the good of his own country, he valued such an union above all things. He knew, in particular, that it was highly important to the interest of the people whom he represented, to conciliate the cordial and affectionate esteem of their Eastern brethren. That this was not only important to his constituents, but to the whole State, and all the Southern country; as on it must materially depend the preservation of our Union, which Mr. L. feared was more necessary to our safety and prosperity than to theirs. Mr. L. said, he never saw any reason to suspect the Eastern people of anti-Republican principles; that there was no just ground to accuse them of such principles in any manner. Mr. L. had always thought that the Southern country had no right to claim a superiority over their Eastern brethren in Republican virtue. Mr. L. always lamented that his country was not, in some points, so fortunately situated as the Eastern States; but still, he rejoiced to find just ideas of liberty, and a proper respect to the rights of men, animating all the citizens of it; and in public virtue they had a right to rank with their brethren to the North and East of them. Mr. L. thought that his colleague's strongest argument was the corrupting relation which existed in Europe between noblemen and their dependants. Mr. L. feared that this argument might too readily be extended to the situation of his country, and conclusions very disparaging to their Republican virtue drawn from it, from which he had felt it his duty to vindicate them.

Mr. L. believed that the people throughout America were all animated by an equal zeal for the liberty and happiness of their country. As a person, therefore, anxious to preserve our harmony and union, he always felt pain at any question, which was, in any degree calculated to excite suspicions of each other and produce enmity, when concord was so much the interest of all. This proposition had, to his mind, a very denouncing aspect; and, as such, he felt it his duty to discountenance it, and every thing of the same sort, without presuming to ascertain or question the motives or designs of the mover. Mr. L. could not help viewing the motion as capable of guarding us from no one danger, but as well fitted to produce unnecessary alarm and irritation.

Mr. L. was indifferent how the question was decided; but, being a friend to harmony and union, he could by no means countenance any his vote any thing that might be construed to denounce a most respectable and patriotic part of this House.

Mr. HILLHOUSE observed, that when the amendment was first introduced, he considered it as altogether harmless and unnecessary; but, being friendly to what appeared to be the object of the mover, that is, keeping out privileged orders from among us, he was inclined to vote for it. Yet, upon more mature reflection, he was of opinion that if the provision contained in the amendment had any effect at all, it would be a directly contrary one from what was intended, and would indirectly establish the principle that privileged orders might be introduced and exist among us, a principle which he wholly rejected and reprobated; and, as he did not doubt that the views of the gentleman who moved the amendment were similar to his own on that subject, he hoped that, upon further consideration, he [Mr. GILES] would withdraw it. It was his opinion that the ground upon which foreigners should be admitted to a share in the administration of our Government ought to be narrowed in every possible way, and if the gentleman would so modify the amendment as wholly to exclude that class of foreigners, or any other, from ever becoming citizens, so far as to elect or be elected to any office, he would most heartily join in giving his vote for it. In those nations where privileged orders are admitted, the benefits and advantages arising from it have been considered as merely local, so that, if a nobleman removes from one nation to another he is not considered as carrying with him the privileges of his order; as, for instance, if a nobleman from any other nation removes to England, where an hereditary nobility is established by law, and even becomes naturalized, he is not a peer of England; he is no more than a private subject, and can claim nothing on account of his former rank. The Convention who formed our Constitution undoubtedly viewed the subject in that light, or they would have been equally anxious to have provided against the importation as of the creation of nobility; but, passing this amendment will, as far as the influence of a law and the opinion of Congress can go, be putting a different and wrong construction upon the Constitution, and will be admitting that there may be some other mode of introducing a privileged order or a nobility among us, than the one guarded against in the Constitution; for, if a law is passed requiring a person, before he shall be admitted to a certain privilege, to renounce some other privilege, it is clearly admitting that such person does or may possess such privilege, otherwise the law is futile, requiring a person to renounce what he does not, or cannot possess.

If we pass the present amendment, the construction must be, that an alien, after residing in this country, abjuring his allegiance to his own, offering to become a citizen of, and taking the oath of fidelity to, the United States, is in possession of the rights of a privileged order to which he may have belonged; and further, that their rights are hereditary, unless he shall, agreeably to the amendment, come forward and renounce them. But what will be the consequence of his not renouncing? Most clearly that he retains and possesses them. A nobleman, then, may come to the United States, marry, purchase lands, and enjoy every other right of a citizen, except that of electing and being elected to office. His children, being natural born citizens, will enjoy, by inheritance, his title, and all the rights of nobility and a privileged order which he possessed, an idea which ought not, either explicitly or impliedly, to be admitted.

As to the impression which may be made on the popular opinion, by voting on one side or the other of the present question, Mr. H. felt no anxiety. He had too good an opinion of the understanding and discernment of his constituents, and of the people of the United States, to suppose they would believe him a friend to privileged orders or a nobility, for voting against a proposition which, in his opinion, was at least altogether futile, if not of a tendency directly opposite to what is proposed. Was any gentleman to sacrifice his judgment to an apprehension of losing his popularity, he would most certainly not only merit but meet with their contempt. The people of the United States are not tickled with sounds; they regard the substance.

Mr. J. WADSWORTH rose next. He had been up four times before, but, other gentlemen always rising along with him, he had sat down again. Mr. W. said, that a rage against nobility and privileged orders now pervades the whole world. He really did not see the use of this amendment. It put him in mind of an old law which, within his memory, had been in use. When a man had shot himself, his neighbors were not contented with the certainty of his being dead in this world, and damned in the next, but, besides all this, they drove a stake through his body. Mr. W. regarded nobility as in a similar situation with such a man, for nobility appeared to him in the certain road to instant destruction; and this amendment of Mr. GILES, he thought, was like driving in the stake. The latter practice had been laid aside, and he thought that the amendment deserved the same fate. He reminded the House that the time had been when America was very much indebted to nobility, and very glad to see them fight her battles. We might now perhaps be taxed with ingratitude on that head, for some of those identical French noblemen, who, during the late war, had rendered us essential service, were now in this country in a state of beggary, subsisting on the charity of their friends. Others of the same noblemen were in dungeons, and some again had got their heads chopped off. He was warranted to say that many of these noblemen when here, during the war, and long before a French revolution had been talked of, were, in their hearts, as good Republicans as any Americans whatever. We had seen, some time ago, a party spirit rising in the United States. He had observed that the thing was dying away, but the present amendment would afford a new theme. The newspapers are extremely numerous, and he doubted not that the writers in them would embrace so notable an opportunity for exercising their talents. As to the notion that there was a danger of nobility being introduced into this country, the thing was held in such detestation in America, that he had no more apprehension of its obtaining a footing here than he had that there would arise a new race of men without heads, or with their heads placed below their shoulders, or any other unnatural production. In short, he did not know a thing so impossible as the establishment of an American nobility. Knowing this, he regarded the amendment as entirely useless. As to the call for the yeas and nays having an impression on his vote, that was out of the question. He knew his constituents, and they knew him; and they were both too well acquainted with each other for a trifle of this nature to have any influence. To him the call was a matter of the utmost indifference, and he took this opportunity to declare frankly that he should vote against the amendment, whether the yeas and nays were called or not.

Mr. NICHOLAS could not consent to abandon the proposition. It might be said that he did so in terror of the amendment of Mr. DEXTER, which he thoroughly despised.

Mr. BOURNOR had not designed to speak on this question, but there was one objection to the amendment, which occurred to him, and which had not been noticed by any gentleman. This was, that it would be an act of injustice to make a man do an act in this country which might affect his own interest and that of his family in another. This case might very possibly happen. A person, by renouncing nobility here, might be debarred from claiming its privileges in another place, when it would, perhaps, be for his advantage.

Mr. ARES observed, that too much attention had been given to the amendment as an abstract question. Nothing tended more to bewilder and confuse a debate than such a departure from the subject into abstractions and refinements; for, although by this means we found that plain principles were rendered obscure, and reasonable doctrines carried to excess, yet we did not seem to reflect that nothing is more opposite to just principles than the extremes of those principles. For instance, it would not be safe or proper indiscriminately to admit aliens to become citizens, yet a scrutiny into their political orthodoxy might be carried to a very absurd extreme. The merit of the amendment depends on its adaptedness to the end proposed by the bill, and what is that? To make a rule of naturalization for the admission of aliens to become citizens, on such terms as may consist with our tranquility and safety. Now, said he, do we think of refusing this privilege to all heretics in respect to political doctrines? Even that strictness would not hasten the millennium. For our own citizens freely propagate a great variety of opinions hostile to each other, and therefore, many of them deviate widely from the intended standard of right thinking; good and bad, fools and wise men, the philosopher and the dupes of prejudice, we find could live very peaceably together, because there was a sufficient coincidence of common interest. If we depend on this strong tie, if we oblige foreigners to wait seven years till they have formed it, till their habits as well as interests become assimilated with our own, we may leave them to cherish or to renounce their imported prejudices and follies as they may choose. The danger of their diffusing them among our own citizens, is to be prevented by public opinion, if we may leave error and prejudice to stand or fall before truth and freedom of inquiry.

Can the advocates of the amendment even affect apprehensions that there is any intention to introduce a foreign nobility as a privileged order? If they can, such diseases of the brain were not bred by reasoning and cannot be cured by it. Still less should we give effect by law to chimerical whimsies. For what is the tendency of this counterfeited alarm? Is it to rouse again the sleeping apparitions which have disturbed the back country? Is it to show that the mock dangers which they have pretended to dread are real? Or, is it to mark a line of separation between those who have the merit of maintaining the extremes of political opinions, and those whom this vote would denounce as stopping at what they deem a wise moderation? If that is the case, it seems that the amendment is intended rather to publish a creed than to settle a rule of Naturalization. Yet it should be noticed that those who would go to extremes are less entitled to the praise of Republicanism than those who would not.

But the consequence of giving an artificial and unmerited importance to the amendment, is, in the first place, to spread an useless and even pernicious alarm, as well as to revive animosities, and, in the next place, by showing our dependence on a futile and ridiculous renunciation of nobility, to evince the want of any good remedy for the evil. If it is an important affair the amendment is far short of what the case requires. If it is, as we all believe, trifling and worthless, then let us spare ourselves the shame of legislating on these frivolities, those phantoms which the friends of the amendment have very slowly, and at last very faintly, pretended to have any substance.

Mr. A. further observed, that the securities which we have already against the introduction of nobility, are sufficient to secure us and our sons, and the sons of our sons, down to the twentieth generation, against a nobility. Is the meaning of this amendment to give a new text for sedition? It was below the dignity of the House to spend its time upon such trifles. The Convention of another nation had indelibly disgraced themselves by legislating upon trifles, while matters of importance stood by. What would be the sense of America upon our spending day after day in debating about such a frivolous thing? He was against the amendment of Mr. GILES.

Mr. SAMUEL SMITH was sorry for the turn which the debate had taken; though at first it bore a trifling appearance, it had since called up all the warmth of the House. The gentlemen from the Eastern States, who knew the Republican character of their constituents, and how independent every man there was, both in his temper and his circumstances, had alighted the amendment as unnecessary. Gentlemen from the Southern States, on the other hand, say that they have some reason to be apprehensive. Why, said Mr. S., will not the Eastern members indulge us in this trifle? It is owned by the one party, that it can have no bad tendency; and the other imagine that it must have a good one. Then why not, for the sake of conciliation, grant it?

Mr. MURRAY was sorry that the House had begun the new year with such a discussion. He had seen with much pleasure the appearances of conciliation and unanimity at the outset of the session. He should vote for the amendment, and he hoped that those members who were against it would come round and vote for it. They would thus put an end to this motion, so wasteful of time. Of nobility, however, the gentleman had no alarming apprehensions. There had been once in this House a baronet. He was there for two years before it was known, and it was then discovered that a baronet was a thing perfectly harmless. As for titles of nobility, he believed that all the wholesome and sensible part of the community looked upon the whole as stuff. When Mr. M. contemplated this subject, it reminded him of Holbein's Dance of Death.* He saw nothing in this country but the ghosts of nobility. In Europe, indeed, it was a matter of importance. It established the etiquette of precedence among the ladies in leading down a country dance. The amendment was not worth much either one way or the other. But he wished it to be granted for the reasons assigned by his colleague from Maryland, who had spoke just before him.

Mr. MADISON.—When the amendment was first suggested, he had considered it as highly proper, and naturally connected with the subject. No man can say how far the Republican revolution that is now proceeding in Europe will go. If ~~the~~ ^{the} ~~his~~ ^{his} part be expected and believed would be the case, the perage of that country would be thronging to the United States. He should be ready to receive them with all that hospitality, tenderness, and respect, to which misfortune is entitled. He should sympathize with them, and be as ready to afford them whatever friendly offices lay in his power, as any man. But this was entirely distinct from admitting them as citizens of America before they were constitutionally qualified to become so. In reply to the remark of Mr. BOURNOR, that a renunciation of their titles might injure their families, Mr. M. observed, that if a British revolution took place, these fugitives would, as aliens, be incapacitated from holding real estates. In discussing this question, we had been reminded of the Marquis de Lafayette. He had the greatest respect for that character; but if he were to come to this country, this very gentleman would be the first to recommend and acquiesce in the amendment on the table. He had urged the necessity of utterly abolishing nobility in France, even at a time when he thought it necessary for the safety of the State that the King should possess a considerable portion of power; and Mr. M. believed, that if he were now at freedom, he was as completely stripped of every thing relative to nobility, as it was possible that he could be. It had been said, that it was needless to make emigrants renounce their rank, and that oaths were no security. He was ready to allow that oaths were, in any case, but a very poor security, but they had been adopted in other parts of the bill, and the same reason which recommended them on former occasions might recommend them now.

Mr. W. SMITH was convinced that the amendment was wholly incompetent to the end which it professed to have in view. You may force a man to renounce his title, but what does that signify, when you cannot hinder his neighbors from calling both him, his wife, and family, by the title? He replied to the argument of Mr. S. SMITH, as to the Eastern members giving up the point for the sake of conciliation with the Southern members.

He did not understand that his own constituents had any such panic about them, or that they would thank the Eastern members very ardently for such a concession. They were not afraid of aristocracy. You cannot abolish the practice; and even supposing a nobleman had made his renunciation, perhaps the very person who administered the oath, may, the next moment, say, "My Lord, I wish you a good morning!" and you cannot punish the individual who says so. As to not allowing of titles to wives and daughters, this renunciation will not prevent their being given. But in some parts of the country we have titles already. Mr. S. had often heard an old lady called "the Duchess." He could see no good consequence from the motion. There was indeed one obvious effect. The ignorant part of the American citizens—who, he hoped were but few—would imagine that those who voted for the amendment were against the introduction of nobility into America, and that those against the amendment were for that introduction. This frivolous kind of legislation had disgraced the proceedings of another nation. They had begun to change the names of their towns and harbors, such as Conde, Dunkirk, Toulon, Havre De Grace, and Lyons. One of these they had named Harre de Murat, and so on. But now they were coming back to their sober judgment and were repealing these edicts. Lyons was restored to its old name. The pillar erected to announce its rebellion and annihilation had been taken down. The Convention had formerly passed a law for demolishing houses inhabited by aristocrats, but now they began to think it was better to let the houses stand. Would anybody say that French liberty was better secured by naming a harbor Harre de Murat? Had this done any good to the cause? But if people who were so much afraid of the introduction of nobility would look around them, they might already find in this country alarming marks of attachment to royalty. When Mr. SMITH was lately at New Haven, in Connecticut, he had observed on the top of the State House the figure of a Crown, which had stood there undisturbed since long before the beginning of the Revolution. He went into the State House, and found the people as good Republicans as could be, notwithstanding this Crown. Again, at Middletown, in the same State, he went into a church, and on the top of the organ there was another Crown, which might also be interpreted as a proof of Monarchical principles. Referring to the subject of changing names, Mr. S. said, that the people in the State of New York had for a long time enjoyed as much liberty as the other States. At last, however, it was recollected that one of the streets of the city of New York was called King's street; but this was changed to Liberty street, which was, to be sure, a very momentous alteration. If Congress descend to legislate in such little-nesses, they may forbid the title of Worshipful. They may abolish the order of Freemasons, which he thought that they had just as much right to do as to make the foreign nobility renounce their titles before they should be accepted as American citizens. The Congress may, among other objects of legislation, forbid any member to come into that House with an aristocratical cloak—one with gold lace, for example. He asked more than once this question: What peculiar privileges has a foreign nobleman, coming into this country, which he possessed more than all other citizens? He considered the whole amendment as totally trifling. He was content that the yeas and nays should be taken. His sentiments were known already. His name should stand among the nays.

Mr. GILES said, that there had been an echo from one end to the other of the House that his amendment was trifling. Was it consistent for the gentleman, who had been up for half an hour, to spend so much time upon a question, and then conclude by telling the House that it was nothing; that he had been talking for so long a time upon a subject that did not merit their attention? What kind of reasoning was this, or how did the gentleman propose to reconcile it? Was it consistent with the warmth which had been discovered, to say that all this discussion, all this length of time, had been consumed upon nothing? But this kind of language had something more serious in it, for this prohibition of nobility formed one of the pillars of the Constitution; so that to call a principle recognised and affirmed by the Constitution a trifle, or nothing, and so on, was a very unguarded proceeding. Another notable argument against agreeing to his amendment had been, that the people already detested nobility so thoroughly that it was not worth while to pass this amendment, as their hatred of it would put an end to it without a law. It was enough that the two principal reasons against his amendment were, first, that it was authorized by the Constitution, and secondly, that it would be agreeable to the people. It is strange that the will of the people, who send us here, is to have no influence in this House, but is to be turned into an argument against passing a law! Mr. G. would adhere to his amendment, because, as the law now stands, there is nothing to hinder a foreigner with a title to become an American citizen, and obtain a seat in this House, and hold both his office and his title. Mr. G. next answered a part of the argument of Mr. W. SMITH, that making people renounce their titles would only rivet their attachment to them, and make them, perhaps, think of these things, when otherwise they would have been forgotten. Mr. G. said, it was quite a new kind of argument, that to renounce a thing was the way to give it existence. If this rule were to hold, he believed that some members of the House would renounce things which they very much wanted. For example, he himself should possibly renounce a hundred thousand dollars. As to the call for yeas and nays, he had some time ago informed the House that he gave up this point. The thing could not affect him, either one way or another, because his sentiments were already known.

Mr. TRACY regretted that so much time should be lost on trifling subjects. We had seen the National Convention of France diminish their dignity, by spending three or four days on the business of giving a name to the late Duke of Orleans, and hardly had they finished, by giving him the name of Egalité, before in substance he became so bad that they cut his head off. What good did his renunciation of title do, excepting that it afforded him a short opportunity of deceiving his fellow-citizens? Mr. T. said he was fully convinced, and had been so from the beginning of the debate on the Naturalization bill, that a length of time was the only valuable probation of an alien, and the only successful mode of discerning his principles, and the justice and propriety of his claim to be naturalized. He thought the sentiments of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GILES] were highly commendable, when he said we ought to avoid extremes in politics, and adopt a sober medium of political reasoning, suited to the steady and rational temper of Americans, equally removed, on the one hand, from tyranny, and on the other from anarchy. And he would ask, whether a solemn abjuration of all foreign allegiance, with proofs of a good moral character, and attachment to the principles of our Government, would not secure us, as to the principles of the heart, as thoroughly, without the faces of renouncing his title, as with it? He considered titles, in this country, as very empty, unmeaning things; and they would go into disuse of themselves, having no solid support, either in the habits or constitution of this country. But, by the Constitution of the United States, any citizen might receive and enjoy a title from a foreign Prince or Sovereignty, and Congress could not prevent it. The words of the Constitution are:

"No title of nobility shall be granted by the United States; and no person holding any office of profit or trust under them, shall, without the consent of Congress, accept any present, emolument, office, or title, of any kind whatever, from any King, Prince, or foreign State."

Mr. T. supposed it was clear that Congress had no power respecting this matter, but what was expressly delegated by the Constitution, and that had given them a check only on officers of their own appointment, leaving every other citizen, not an officer of Government, at liberty to retain a foreign title if he pleased. And an alien might, even if this amendment should pass, renounce his title, become naturalized, and in an hour accept of the same title, or another, from any foreign Prince, and Congress can make no laws to prevent it. If it be a fault that our citizens can receive and enjoy titles, it is a Constitutional one; Congress are not blameable for it, but they would be blameable were they to arrogate powers not given them, upon this or any other subject. Mr. T. repeated, that there could be no danger in this country from titles; they were universally considered as trifles, and it would be dignifying them too much to legislate about them. He asked the gentleman who brought forward this motion, whether it was not, in a measure, a departure from his former declaration, of sober, rational temper, in politics, to insist so much upon its importance as he did? He was sorry the yeas and nays were insisted upon with so much spirit; it looked like party, in a very unimportant matter: he did not mean to accuse any man, or men, and mentioned it with diffidence, but it really struck his mind in this way. Much had been said about adhering to the Constitution strictly, on former occasions; but, from many things said now, it seemed as though there was no safety for the people, unless the House of Representatives absorbed the whole Governmental power. Mr. T. said, if that House should become political cannibals, and attempt to devour both the other branches of the Legislature, he would oppose it, whether it was popular, or not; for he considered the Constitutional checks of the branches of this Government, upon one another, as containing the most complete security for liberty, that any people could enjoy. If his construction was a just one, Mr. T. thought the amendment ment could do no good; it formed a test which might make hypocrites, but not proselytes; it stripped an alien for a moment of a trifle, which in the next he might resume and wear forever.

Mr. SEDGWICK.—Has it not been said that there was a party in the United States, not only for Aristocracy, but even for Monarchy? Is not the present a most favorable opportunity for holding up these people to popular resentment? He was convinced that the gentleman who moved this amendment had no design of doing any such thing, but that did not lessen the reality. He said that Mr. GILES had brought gentlemen into a dilemma, which he did not, or would not, see. They had at first opposed the motion, as trifling, and this they had a right to do. The member [Mr. GILES] then moved his call for the yeas and nays; and if gentlemen who had already spoken against the amendment, were now to draw back, and vote for it, they would betray a disgraceful poverty of spirit. Their constituents would say that their votes had been given in terror of the yeas and nays. The motives for pushing this call could be nothing else but to stigmatize members of that House, as wanting to introduce a nobility, whereas they opposed the amendment on no such account, but merely because it was not worth their taking up. As to himself, he did not care. He could not wish to stand better with his constituents than he actually did. He was well known to them. But, in other quarters of the Continent, it might be said that the Eastern States were represented by aristocrats. If this be a desirable object, said Mr. S., in God's name, let gentlemen persist in calling for the yeas and nays. It will be said, "there go the Eastern aristocrats! They want to import nobility here, when it can no longer exist in Europe!" Mr. S. said, that at first, he gave but little opposition to the amendment, thinking it frivolous. He repeatedly declared, upon his honor, that he firmly believed it to be so, and that he had no other reason for opposing it. If he had been, upon this occasion, warmer than usual, he was sorry for it; but the mischievous and unconciliating consequences of this call for the yeas and nays, had hurt him exceedingly.

Mr. MADISON denied the assertion of Mr. SEDGWICK, that the amendment was trifling; and the member himself seemed to betray, by his behaviour, a consciousness that he had not promoted conciliation. An abolition of titles was essential to a Republican revolution, and therefore such an abolition had been highly proper in France. The sons of the Cincinnati could not have inherited their honors, and yet the minds of the Americans were universally disgusted with the institution, and in particular, in South Carolina; yet a member from that State [Mr. W. SMITH] has told the House that his constituents were under no fears of aristocracy, and that they could hear titles without emotion. Even the Chief Magistrate of South Carolina had told the Cincinnati that these distinctions ought to be laid aside.

Mr. HILLHOUSE thought it quite frivolous to spend time upon the motion. That was all his objection. It had been said that, allying the amendment to be trifling, yet it was no harm to make an idle law, and that therefore it should be agreed to for the sake of conciliation. Supposing a man to make a will, bequeathing a hundred thousand guineas, when he was not worth a shilling, there would be one serious effect at least, for it would make the testator ridiculous. To legislate for the sake of expressing a sentiment, was very silly, and what he never should agree to. If Mr. GILES would make an amendment incapable of being taken all foreigners whatever from holding, upon any account, a civil office in America, Mr. H. would agree with him, because he did not want to see any of them in such offices, and conceived that Americans could legislate for themselves much better without any such assistance.

H. or R.]

Naturalization Bill.

Mr. LYMAN said, that whenever a member of that House called for the yeas and nays, it was a rule with him to rise and second the motion, because the people had, upon all occasions, a right to know their votes; and even if only one member desires the yeas and nays to be taken, Mr. L. conceived that it ought to be done, as the thing was in itself so highly proper. Since he had the honor of a seat in that House, therefore, he had always seconded every call for yeas and nays, that the public might understand, as fully as possible, what they were about, and how their votes went. He said that it was extremely improper to ascribe wrong motives, when gentlemen supported a call for yeas and nays. It was sacrificing the dignity of the House to cast out such insinuations. When the call had once been made and agreed to, it would be very mean to retract it, to gratify any member. The public had always, and without any exception, a right to know what their Representatives were doing, and how they were voting, and he, for one, should adhere to the call.

Mr. W. SMITH said, that he had already put a question which nobody had answered, and on that account he should now rise and put it again. What are the emigrant nobility to renounce? When they come into this country, they possess not one privilege which is not possessed by everybody else. He had expected that the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. GILES] when last up, would have explained this matter, but he had not done it. The great bugbear was, lest a ci-devant Lord may get a seat here, and that somebody may call him My Lord. But, even after you have got his renunciation of nobility, if other people choose to give him his titles, you can neither hinder nor punish them; so that the amendment is, to all practical intents and purposes, absolutely useless and nugatory. Some members of this House belong to the order of Cincinnati. If they come here with badges at their button-holes, can you forbid them? He wished that gentlemen would show what was to be renounced. There was nothing at all to renounce. The whole amendment is totally futile.

Mr. DEXTER then rose, but the House had become so impatient for the question, that he was heard with difficulty. He only wanted to ask whether the call for yeas and nays was withdrawn or not?

Mr. McDOWELL said that he had already informed the House that he should insist on the call.

Mr. AMES then asked, whether it was not competent to put the previous question, viz: Shall this call be now taken?

The SPEAKER, in reply, said, that according to his judgment, the previous question could have been regularly taken upon any topic whatever, which produced a debate; but the House, by a recent decision, had determined that the previous question could not be regularly taken upon an amendment.

He was then asked, whether the call of yesterday was valid to-day, or if it was necessary for the members to rise over again? Mr. SEDGWICK was clearly of this opinion; in which the SPEAKER, after some consideration, concurred, as some gentlemen had deserted the call, and he in reality, did not know whether a fifth part of the members would support a call or not.

It was then suggested, that there could not be a second call, if the first was disappointed; and some gentleman said, that he hoped no member would insist on a thing so extremely distressing to the feelings of many members. Several gentlemen had now attempted to speak at the same time, and the mischievous and unconciliating effects of the call were enumerated with much emphasis.

Mr. NEW at last came forward, and declared that he moved for a call. Mr. McDOWELL said the same.

Mr. SEDGWICK then rose again. He appealed to the House, that, since he had a seat in Congress, he had never troubled them with a call more than a very few times; and he affirmed, upon his honor, that he never had moved for the yeas and nays at all, unless he was uncertain how the votes of the House would go. But the gentlemen who now moved for the call had not this excuse. They knew very well that they would carry their point, and that by a large majority; so that the insisting for the yeas and nays could arise only from a design that gentlemen who voted against the amendment should be held out to the public as wanting to introduce a nobility. He owed little to Mr. GILES for having withdrawn his motion, when others were so ready to renew it.

Mr. NEW, on hearing these remarks, declared that he should withdraw his motion, since so much had been said about it.

Mr. BLOUNT then rose, and said that it was needless to waste time, for the yeas and nays must and should be taken.

Twenty-three members seconded his motion, and the SPEAKER declared that the point was now determined.

Mr. DEXTER next rose, and observed that he had withdrawn his amendment, under a hope of conciliation, and that the yeas and nays would not be taken. But since this request had been refused, he should move it again, and have the yeas and nays upon that likewise, and before the other. He went over the beaten ground of the bad consequences of holding members up to popular resentment.

Mr. VENABLE said, that if the gentleman were so disposed he should willingly try the question at once on this motion, without farther investigation about it.

On calling over the names, there were, on the amendment of Mr. DEXTER—yeas 28, nays 63, as follows:

YEAS.—Fisher Ames, James Armstrong, Shearjashub Bourne, Lambert Cadwalader, David Cobb, Peleg Coffin, Joshua Cuit, Samuel Dexter, Dwight Foster, Ezekiel Gilbert, Henry Glenn, Benjamin Goodhue, James Gordon, Thomas Hartley, Amasa Learned, William Lyman, Francis Malbone, William Vans Murray, Theodore Sedgwick, Jeremiah Smith, George Thatcher, Uriah Tracy, John E. Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendments agreed to, be recommitted to Mr. MADISON, Mr. DEXTER, and Mr. CARNES.

MONDAY, January 5.

THOMAS SPRING, from Maryland, appeared, and took his seat in the House.

A memorial of Thomas Dannery, Consul of the French Republic, residing in the town of Boston, in the State of Massachusetts, in behalf of a number of French citizens, late inhabitants of Saint Pierre's and Miquelon, was presented to the House and read, praying a remission of the tonnage duties accruing on sundry shallops and small schooners, which were employed to convey the said French citizens to the said town of Boston, from Halifax and Shelburne, in the province of Nova Scotia, where they were sent as prisoners, by the British army, in the course of the late war.

Ordered, That the said memorial be referred to Mr. SAMUEL SMITH, Mr. LYMAN, and Mr. VAN CORTLANDT; that they do examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their opinion thereupon, to the House.

Ordered, That a committee be appointed to inquire and report whether any, and what, alterations ought to be made to the act imposing duties on snuff manufactured within the United States; and that Mr. WILLIAM SMITH, Mr. NICHOLAS, Mr. SAMUEL SMITH, Mr. LYMAN, and Mr. FINDLEY, be the said committee.

Ordered, That the Committee of the Whole House on the report of the committee appointed to prepare and report a plan for the reduction of the Public Debt, to whom was committed the memorial of sundry manufacturers of tobacco in the city of Philadelphia, be discharged from the further consideration of the same, and that the said memorial be referred to the committee last appointed.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill for the ascertainment of certain losses of the officers of Government, and other citizens, by the insurgents in the Western counties of Pennsylvania, and providing some present relief to the sufferers.

Ordered, That the said bill be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill making further provision in cases of drawbacks; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said bill under consideration, and made several amendments thereto; which were severally twice read, and agreed to by the House.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendments, be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

A message from the Senate informed the House, that the Senate have passed a bill, entitled "An act further extending the time for receiving on Loan the Domestic Debt of the United States;" to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the report of the committee appointed to consider and report on the expediency of making any further alterations in the Laws of the United States relative to the cession of the jurisdiction by particular States, in lands where are established, or may by law be directed to be built and established, light-houses, buoys, and public piers; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said report under consideration, and come to a resolution thereupon; which he delivered in at the Clerk's table.

Ordered, That the said resolution do lie on the table.

The bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act further extending the time for receiving on Loan the Domestic Debt of the United States," was twice read, and committed.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, accompanying reports on sundry petitions; which letter was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

THE FORTIFICATIONS.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the report of the committee to whom was referred the report of the Secretary of War, respecting the Fortifications of the United States.

On this subject, Mr. MADISON objected to the making the Fortifications in the most expensive and durable style, because it may hereafter be found, that the situations which have been chosen are not the most proper.

Mr. S. SMITH said, that the objection of the gentleman struck him very forcibly. He then mentioned the absurd management at Baltimore, built, looked extremely well, and had only one fault, viz: that they were absolutely useless. An hundred men might at any time land from behind, take the battery in the rear, and turn it against the defenders. Vast labor had been bestowed on it by the people of Baltimore, and their labor and the public money had been equally cast away. Mr. S. had little confidence in Land Fortifications. He instanced Mud Island, of which he spoke as a military man, and from personal knowledge. The Fortifications could not have hindered British ships from coming up the river, but for the cheateau de fizee. They protected that, but could not, of themselves, have kept a ship from coming up; so, he reckoned that much money had been cast away on them, too. Floating batteries might be of service, but not land batteries.

The Committee rose, reported progress, and asked leave to sit again.

Mr. MADISON, from the select committee, reported a new bill of Naturalization, containing the amendments recommended, and also whatever was necessary from the Old Law, so that the latter should be entirely superseded. The report was read by the Clerk, and made the order of the day for to-morrow.

TUESDAY, January 6.

An engrossed bill for the ascertainment of certain losses of the officers of Government and other citizens, by the insurgents in the Western counties of Pennsylvania, and providing some present relief to the sufferers, was read the third time, and passed.

An engrossed bill making further provision in cases of drawbacks was read the third time, and passed.

A memorial and remonstrance of the sugar refiners, in the city of Philadelphia, was presented to the House and read, praying a revision of the Excise Laws of the United States; and that so much of the act passed at the last session of Congress, entitled "An act laying certain duties upon snuff and refined sugar," as imposes a duty on sugar refined within the United States, may be repealed.

Ordered, That the said memorial and remonstrance be referred to the committee appointed to inquire and report whether any, and what, alterations ought to be made in the act imposing duties on snuff manufactured within the United States; and that Mr. FITZSIMONS and Mr. MADISON be added to the said committee.

A memorial of the Transylvania Company, commonly called Richard Henderson & Company, was presented to the House and read, praying that such compensation may be made to the memorialists and their legal representatives, for a quantity of land which they purchased from the Cherokee Indians, in the year one thousand seven hundred and seventy-four, and has since been ceded to the United States, by the treaty of Holston, as to the wisdom of Congress shall seem meet.

Ordered, That the said memorial do lie on the table.

A petition of James Denniston, of Ohio county, in the State of Virginia, was presented to the House and read, praying that the location which he has made of the proportion of land, due for his services during the late war, in the second range of townships on the river Ohio, together with the improvements thereon, may be confirmed to him, and a grant issued for the same. Also, a petition of Elijah Woods, to the same effect.

Ordered, That the said petitions be referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the report of the committee to whom was referred the petition of sundry soldiers in the late Army of the United States.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill supplementary to the several acts imposing duties on goods, wares, and merchandise, imported into the United States; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose, and reported the bill with amendments.

NATURALIZATION BILL.

The House then went into a committee on the bill to establish a uniform system of Naturalization, and to repeal the law formerly made on that head. One of the clauses in the new bill proposed to make aliens becoming citizens of the United States abjure their allegiance to all other States forever.

Mr. BOURNOR said, that a very respectable emigrant, who had brought a large fortune with him, and who would very likely be of much use to the country, had assured him that, rather than swallow such an oath, he would return to his own country. Mr. B. declared, that he always had considered oaths of allegiance as an imposition. They might keep away men who had scruples, because they had principles; others would swear, and break off, when it suited them. The word forever implied that these people were not at liberty to return home, and reassume the allegiance to their own country. What if the United States were to become a tyrannical Government? Were people not to have the liberty of leaving it? It had been replied by some gentlemen that the word forever did not imply that the emigrant would never be at liberty to return to his country, and resume his former allegiance. On that ground, they had urged to keep it in. Others had asserted that it did convey such a signification, and for that reason they would have it kept in. How is an alien in this case to act? One party say your oath means thus, and therefore you may take it. Another set of gentlemen give the oath an opposite meaning, and insist on its being taken. What kind of swearing is this, said Mr. B? To enact oaths which the very makers of the law could not agree about the meaning of, was to him very odd. He had done his duty in exposing the absurdity of the thing, and should move to strike out forever.

This motion was carried. And the Committee rose, and the Chairman reported progress.

WEDNESDAY, January 7.

A petition of James Caldwell, of the city of Albany, in the State of New York, was presented to the House and read, praying a remission of the duties imposed by law on a quantity of snuff manufactured by the petitioner, which, together with his manufactory, and other property, was consumed by fire, on the 12th day of July last.

Ordered, That the said petition be referred to the committee appointed to inquire and report whether any, and what, alterations ought to be made in the act imposing duties on snuff manufactured within the United States.

A memorial of John Field, Jesse and Robert Wain, and Hartsborne, Large, & Company, merchants, of the city of Philadelphia, was presented to the House and read, praying that the exportation of lead from the United States may permitted in all vessels engaged in the India or China trade.

Ordered, That the said memorial be referred to Mr. FITZSIMONS, Mr. GOODHUE, and Mr. RUTHERFORD; that they do examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their opinion thereupon, to the House.

The House proceeded to consider the amendments reported yesterday from the Committee of the Whole House, to the bill supplementary to the several acts imposing duties on goods, wares, and merchandise, imported into the United States.

The bill was then further amended, and, together with the amendments, ordered to be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the report of the committee to whom was referred the petition of Epaphras Jones, in behalf of himself, Stephen Gorham, Shubal Gorham, and Charles Selden; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said report under consideration, and come to a resolution thereupon; which was twice read, and agreed to by the House, as follows:

Resolved, That it shall and may be lawful for the Collector of the District of New York, to remit to Epaphras Jones, Stephen Gorham, Shubal Gorham, and Charles Selden, owners of the brigantine called the Peru, the duties of impost and tonnage which may be incurred, in consequence of the incompetent or invalid register of the said brigantine; provided they shall obtain, within one hundred and twenty days, a new register for the said brigantine, in the manner prescribed by law.

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in, pursuant to the said resolution, and that Mr. GOODHUE, Mr. COFFIN, and Mr. GULMAN, do prepare and bring in the same.

The House went into a Committee of the Whole, on the report of the select committee, on the petition of Mary S. Jones.

There was a considerable degree of doubt whether this case did not fall within the statute of limitation lately passed.

Mr. MONTGOMERY was clearly of opinion that it did so. He thought it would be a degree of trifling in the House, to make a law in one session and in the next to declare that there was to be an exception to it.

Several other gentlemen spoke, and, as it appeared that there was no general opinion formed on the subject, the Committee rose, the Chairman reported progress, and asked leave to sit again, which was granted.

The House took up the Naturalization Bill. The word forever was struck out agreeably to the amendment in Committee of the Whole. The House went through the other amendments. The bill was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading to-morrow.

Mr. FITZSIMONS observed, that the saving in the Post Office had lately amounted to a considerable sum. He did not imagine that the money could be applied to a better use than for the making of Post Roads. He laid on the table a motion for forming out of this fund Southern and Eastern States.

PROMULGATION OF THE LAWS.

There was then a motion for going into a Committee on the report of the select committee relative to the more general promulgation of the Laws of the United States. Gentlemen seemed considerably at a loss in what way this promulgation could be most effectually accomplished. Various schemes were proposed, of which not one appeared to meet the general sense of the members. Among other expedients, it was proposed to transmit them to the several States.

But, on this head, Mr. BALDWIN remarked—that, if these States were not more successful in circulating the Laws of Congress than they sometimes were in distributing their own, the printing of three thousand copies, as proposed, would answer but little purpose. He further observed, that the bill ought to provide some place in each State, or each county, where complete sets of the Laws might be lodged; otherwise, as it is proposed to publish the additional acts of every session at the end of it, there may happen to be a State or county to which all the Laws have been sent, and yet where in a complete set of them is not to be had.

The Committee rose, the Chairman reported progress, and the House adjourned.

THURSDAY, January 8.

An engrossed bill supplementary to the several acts imposing duties on goods, wares, and merchandise, imported into the United States, was read the third time, and passed.

A petition of Francis Peyrinhaut, of the town of Edenton, in the State of North Carolina, administrator of Pierre Decamps, deceased, was presented to the House and read, praying the renewal of certain loan-office certificates, the property of the deceased, which were destroyed by an armed banditti, some time in the month of December, one thousand seven hundred and eighty-two; the loss of which, owing to unavoidable circumstances, has not been advertised within the time, and in the manner prescribed by law.

Ordered, That the said petition be referred to Mr. DEXTER, Mr. LEE, and Mr. HARTLEY; that they do examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their opinion thereupon, to the House.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

Gentlemen of the Senate, and of the House of Representatives:

I lay before Congress copies of Acts passed by the Legislatures of the States of Vermont, Massachusetts, and New York, ratifying the amendment proposed by the Senate and House of Representatives at their last session, to the Constitution of the United States, respecting the Judicial power thereof.

The Minister of the French Republic having communicated to the Secretary of State certain proceedings of the Committee of Public Safety, respecting Weights and Measures, I lay these also before Congress.

The Letter from the Governor of the Western Territory, copies of which are now transmitted, refers to a defect in the Judicial system of that Territory deserving the attention of Congress.

The necessary absence of the Judge of the District of Pennsylvania, upon business connected with the late insurrection, is stated by him, in a Letter, of which I forward copies, to have produced certain interruptions in the Judicial proceedings of that District, which cannot be removed without the interposition of Congress.

G. WASHINGTON.

UNITED STATES, January 8, 1795.

Ordered, That so much of the said Message as relates to the Letters from the Judge of the District of Pennsylvania, and the Governor of the Territory of the United States Northwest of the river Ohio, be referred to Mr. DEXTER, Mr. HARTLEY, and Mr. HARRISON, with instruction to examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their opinion thereupon, to the House.

Ordered, That such other parts of the said Message as relate to the ratification of the amendment proposed by Congress to the Constitution of the United States, by the Legislatures of the States of Massachusetts, Vermont, and New York, and the proceedings of the Committee of Public Safety of the French Republic, respecting Weights and Measures, do lie on the table.

Ordered, That a committee be appointed to inquire whether any, or what, alteration is necessary to be made in the laws respecting lost or destroyed certificates; and that Mr. LEE, Mr. DEXTER, and Mr. GREGG, be the said committee.

NATURALIZATION BILL.

The bill to establish a uniform system of naturalization, and to repeal the act heretofore passed on that subject, was then read a third time, and passed. The filling up of the blanks in this bill produced a dispute of some length, and from the intricacy in some parts of it, the abridging of it would be a work of difficulty. Several members spoke to the filling up of the blanks, and their arguments sometimes applied equally to all the three clauses before the House. To be intelligible, therefore, it appears necessary in the first place to insert the clauses themselves at length, as in the end filled up. We shall then repeat some of the remarks made on the subject by different gentlemen. The sections of the bill in question were as follows:

1. The alien shall have declared on oath or affirmation, before the Supreme, Superior, District, or Circuit Court of some one of the States, or a Circuit or District Court of the United States, three years at least before his admission, that it was, bona fide, his intention to become a citizen of the United States, and to renounce all allegiance and fidelity to any foreign Prince, Potentate, State, or Sovereignty whatever, and particularly by name the Prince, Potentate, State, or Sovereignty whereof such alien may, at the time, be a citizen or subject.

2. He shall, at the time of his application to be admitted, declare on oath or affirmation, before some one of the Courts aforesaid, that he has resided within the United States five years at least, and within the State where such Court is at the time held, one year at least; that he will support the Constitution of the United States; and that he doth renounce and abjure all allegiance and fidelity to every foreign Prince, Potentate, State, or Sovereignty, whatever, and particularly by name the Prince, Potentate, State, or Sovereignty whereof he was before a citizen or subject; which proceedings shall be recorded by the Clerk of the Court.

3. The Court admitting such alien, shall be satisfied that he has resided within the limits, and under the jurisdiction of the United States five years; and it shall further appear to their satisfaction, that during that time he has behaved as a man of a good moral character, attached to the principles of the Constitution of the United States, and well disposed to the good order and happiness of the same.

Some gentlemen having spoke on the propriety of different terms for admission, Mr. MADISON said, that he feared the House would never see an end of the discussion, if they went on at this rate, for, by descending to discriminate all the qualifications of a citizen, they run the hazard of losing the bill altogether, from the mere waste of time. Ten years were named by Mr. MURRAY to fill up the first blank, and seven years by Mr. HARTLEY. These terms he thought by much too long. This would oblige the friends of the bill to vote against it.

Mr. BALDWIN objected that the law was inconsistent with itself, for a man is not to be admitted as a citizen to vote for ten years, while a residence of nine years may qualify him to be elected a Senator. This differed from the temper of the Constitution.

Mr. S. SMITH said, that the discussion on several parts of the bill in Committee had appeared to him unimportant, that the great object with him was the time of probation. He was for the longest term, that the prejudices which the aliens had imbibed under the Government from whence they came might be effaced, and that they might, by communication and observance of our laws and government, have just ideas of our Constitution and the excellence of its institution before they were admitted to the rights of a citizen. A gentleman from Virginia [Mr. NICHOLAS] had stated that holding a purse with money in it was sufficient to admit strangers to a vote in Maryland; the fact was not so; before an alien can be admitted to the right of suffrage, he must abjure all allegiance to the King of Great Britain, take the oaths to the State, and to support the Government of the United States, and have one year's residence. The gentleman says, that the bill can only embrace the officers of Government and the commercial interest, and fears that the Eastern States wish to exclude the competition that arises from the foreign merchant. He could not see how that jealousy could apply for it was as rare to see a foreign merchant in New England, as to see a native merchant in Virginia; that if the gentleman thought the place of foreign merchants would be filled from New England, he could foresee no injury, on the contrary a benefit. For, in case of war, you might be assured that they would not act as spies; that there were many merchants from New England in Maryland—that they were good Republicans, good citizens, and always industrious.

Mr. FRIZZIMON thought that ten years were much too long a time for keeping an alien from being a citizen—it would make this class of people enemies to your Government. He was firmly of opinion that emigrants deserved to be encouraged; and to discourage them was an idea which till this day he had never heard either in or out of the House. Nature seems to have pointed out this country as an asylum for the people oppressed in other parts of the world. It would be wrong, therefore, to first admit them here, and then treat them for so long a time so hardly. As to the merchants from this country returning home with their wealth acquired here, it was not the case in Pennsylvania, whatever it might be in Virginia. They very seldom went home again, but married and settled in the country. He also thought the country obliged to them, as it was capable of employing the largest capital which could be brought into it. He knew of no such competition as the gentleman spoke about between the natives and the aliens.

Mr. BOWDINOT reminded the House of a late Proclamation by the President, wherein, among other things, it is said that this country is an asylum to the oppressed of all nations. He was for shortening the period of admission. He saw a great deal in the remark as to the bad policy of admitting people into the country and refusing them for so long a period the rights of citizens.

Several other gentlemen spoke. The bill finally passed.

FRIDAY, January 9.

A petition of Charles Heems, of the State of Georgia, was presented to the House and read, praying that a new register may be granted in the case of the brig Siltaire, an American bottom, which was captured by the British, and afterwards retaken by the French, and carried into Aux Cayes, in the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-three; the said brig being condemned as British property, and the original register detained by the captors.

Ordered, That the said petition be referred to Mr. CARRIS, Mr. GILBERT, and Mr. HANCOCK; that they do examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their opinion thereupon, to the House.

A petition of William Hill Serjeant and Nathaniel Richardson, merchants and partners, of the town of Petersburg, in the State of Virginia, was presented to the House and read, praying that they may be allowed the amount of the drawback on a quantity of wine exported from the port of Petersburg, and duly landed at Rotterdam, in the United Netherlands, in the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-two; a judgment having been obtained in the District Court of the United States for the State of Virginia, on the bond given for the duties accruing on the said wine, previous to receiving the evidence required by law for relating the same.

Ordered, That the said petition be referred to Mr. GILES, Mr. GILBERT, and Mr. LATIMER; that they do examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their opinion thereupon, to the House.

A petition of John Finley, late a Captain in the Pennsylvania line of the Continental Army, was presented to the House and read, praying that the location which he has made of the proportion of land due for his military services, during the late war, in one of the ranges of townships on the river Ohio, together with the improvements thereon, may be confirmed to him, and a grant issued for the same.

Ordered, That the said petition be referred to the Committee of the Whole House to whom is committed the report of the committee on the petition of sundry soldiers in the late Army.

Mr. GOODRICH, from the committee appointed, presented a bill for the relief of Ephraim Jones, and others; which was read twice and committed.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill, entitled "An act to authorize the settlement of the claim of Samuel Prioleau," to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

Mr. FRIZZMOSS, from the committee to whom was referred the memorial of John Field, Jesse and Robert Wain, and Hartsborn, Large, and Company, merchants, of the city of Philadelphia, made a report; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act to authorize the settlement of the claim of Samuel Prioleau," was read twice, and committed.

ORGANIZATION OF THE MILITIA.

The House took up the report of the select committee, relative to arming, organizing and disciplining the Militia of the United States. The report recommended to enforce the law by suitable penalties; and a long debate ensued whether Congress had a right to enact such penalties. The following clause in the Constitution gave rise to this debate:

"The Congress shall have power to provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining the Militia, and for governing such part of them as may be employed in the service of the United States, reserving to the States respectively, the appointment of the officers, and the authority of training the Militia according to the discipline prescribed by Congress."

A great number of gentlemen spoke on this point. Mr. SEDGWICK observed that to a Government to which was committed the charge of defending society, against internal violence and external invasion, means adequate to the attainment of those important objects, ought to be delegated. These means must be composed of efficient force, in the form of militia, or of that which was generally considered as beneficial to liberty, a standing army. A Constitution which was designed to perpetuate freedom would doubtless intend to render the former as efficient, and the latter as unnecessary as possible. In legislating on this subject, if any uncertainty should occur, those principles should have their due influence in the construction to be given to the Constitution.

He laid it down as a principle, which he presumed would not be disputed by any one, that a complete and uncontrolled power over the militia was deposited in the National and State Governments. The only question was, which was to delegate the distribution of those powers? To the former it was expressly delegated to provide "for the organizing, arming, and disciplining, the militia." These words, when applied to the subject, were as full and comprehensive, perhaps, as any in our language. The question before the Committee was, could penalties be imposed, if they should become necessary, to carry into effect those powers? The maxim was undoubtedly true, that when a general power was granted, all the usual and known means necessary and proper to carry it into effect were granted also. If, then, the imposition of penalties were the usual and known means to effectuate "the organizing, arming and disciplining of the Militia," it would follow of irresistible consequence, that they might be employed for that purpose, if not prevented by the powers reserved to the States.

To the States it was reserved to appoint officers, and to train the militia, according to "the discipline prescribed by Congress." A reservation controlling a general grant should receive a strict construction. "Trainings," he believed a word more limited and less comprehensive than "disciplining," which he considered as comprehending all the means necessary to be employed to constitute the character of a soldier. "Training" comprehended only a part of those means. It would to his mind seem absurd, and almost contradictory, that when there was committed to this Government the protection and defence of each individual, and of the whole community, when this Government itself was founded on principles which cherished a militia to the exclusion of a standing force, wherever it could be done, when the Government, for those important purposes, was directed to provide for "organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia;" it would seem absurd and contradictory to say, penalties could not be imposed by law. It would be in the same sentence to grant and to deny; for he would run the hazard to affirm, that without penalties no effectual provision could be made for "organizing, arming and disciplining the militia."

It was not, he believed, difficult to conjecture by what means this distribution of powers between the National and State Governments had crept into the Constitution. It would have seemed incongruous to have denied to Congress a complete control over the militia. But having conceded this power in the words which had been so often repeated, a laudable jealousy would naturally have excited an apprehension, that, at some future time, the militia might be neglected to afford a pretence for standing armies. This jealousy could in no other way have been so well quieted as by authorizing the States, who would discern, and guard against the intended encroachments, by "training," to keep alive the spirit of the militia. On this supposition, the Constitutional distribution of powers in this instance was consistent, and dictated by rational reflection.

To pursue further the subject, when the militia should be called into the actual service of the United States, Congress were by the Constitution to provide for their government. This was necessary to prevent a State, in case of disaffection, from defeating, under a pretence of "training," the exercise of the general powers granted to this Government.

Mr. SEDGWICK said, that it had always appeared to him anti-Republican to attempt to narrow the powers of this Government over the militia. An effective force of some kind must be at the disposal of the Government, which a militia could never be, unless adequate penalties were prescribed, and in every instance, be had to a standing army. There was no other alternative.

He was not in this case influenced by local considerations. The militia of the State to which he belonged was respectable and effective. He was sorry to add that in some of the States the reverse was confessedly and lamentably true. He had at all times been anxious to perceive, that the opposition to this measure had arisen from those districts for whose peculiar benefit it was designed.

Mr. MORRIS wished that some gentleman who was better acquainted with military matters than himself would explain the distinction between the two words, "training and disciplining," used in the above clauses of the Constitution.

Mr. S. SMITH rose to answer this query. Training implied chiefly teaching a man to handle his arms, to stand upright, to wheel to the right and left, and to march. But disciplining comprehended a great deal more. A disciplined soldier must understand the duties of a sentinel, the art of encamping, and a number of other things which a common militia man did not learn when only training. He said that the first duty of a soldier ought to be to take care of himself, and an acquaintance with this lesson had been severely felt by many in the late expedition to the Westward. Numbers of the militia did not know how to set up a tent. The Virginia militia who went out were neither disciplined nor trained. The Marylanders appear to have been much in the same situation, for when Mr. Smith drove part of them out and ordered them to load, he found that fifty had put down the ball before the charge of powder. Some of them did not even know how to lay a gun over their shoulder. He pressed the Committee to come to a decision immediately. Gentlemen said that they hoped that there would be no more insurrection. I hope so too, (said Mr. S.) but does that insure the thing? I believe not, sir. Nothing had been farther from the thoughts of the House last session than an insurrection.

Mr. FRIZZMOSS hoped that the house would come to some resolution on the subject. He was authorized to say that the Legislature of Pennsylvania were waiting in suspense to see what would be done by Congress.

Mr. TRACY said, he was convinced of the necessity of amending the militia law; before Congress made any regulations of the kind, the militia, in the State he came from, was under very good discipline; but he really thought the present law of the United States had a tendency to injure, instead of assisting, the regularity and discipline which had been before established by the State in their militia law. It had been said, the Constitution did not give Congress power to enforce their act by penalties, because training the militia was reserved to the several States. He should be sorry to give a forced explanation to any part of the Constitution, and if there were any who wished it in that House, as had been hinted, he would oppose every such attempt; but he could not reverence the opinions of gentlemen who had uniformly opposed the Constitution, before and since its adoption, till lately, and now pretended to be its greatest friends, and under that mask wished to fritter it down to rags, and reduce it literally to the state of self-righteousness—the more we have of it the worse. He then read the clause of the Constitution, and said, it was clear that all the power respecting the militia, was, by the first part of the sentence, deposited in Congress; but a special reservation was afterwards made to the States to appoint officers—this was explicit; and what more was reserved to the States? To train the militia pursuant to the discipline prescribed by Congress. This, he said, could give them no power of training, but in exact obedience to the rules given them by Congress; that is, Congress will take every necessary step to organize, arm and discipline the militia, (except officering); they will get the men on the field, when they are there the State is to train them, is to be the Executive of the United States, and exactly pursuant to their rules train the militia. The training mentioned in the Constitution, he said, could mean no more; as disciplining, which was expressly in the hands of Congress, included training, but training did not include disciplining—a good definition of the difference between the two terms had been given by Mr. S. SMITH, who had spoken before him.

Mr. T. said, in ordinary cases, a certain specified portion of power was, by the Constitution, given to Congress, and all not specified was of course reserved by the States; but in this case the tables were turned—all the power was vested in Congress by the first part of the sentence, and a specified portion reserved to the States, which ought to be strictly construed, so as to give the several States no constructive power to defeat any thing Congress should do upon the subject; or, prevent uniform and general laws from operating by the interference of local and State regulations. He, therefore, was clearly of opinion the power of Congress, by the express words of the Constitution, extended to enforcing by penalties as contemplated by the resolution before the Committee.

Mr. GILES was not for straining the Constitution, but he was clear that Congress had such a power of enforcing the execution of the law.

The Committee went through the resolution, and reported it to the House, where it was twice read and agreed to, in the following words:

Resolved, That the act, entitled "An act more effectually to provide for the national defence, by establishing an uniform Militia throughout the United States," ought to be amended; and that further provision ought to be made by law for arming the Militia of the United States, and for enforcing the execution of the Militia laws, by adequate and uniform penalties.

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in pursuant to the said resolution, and that Mr. GILES, Mr. SEDGWICK, Mr. HEISTER, Mr. LOCKE, Mr. VAN CORTLANDT, Mr. DAYTON, Mr. SAMUEL SMITH, Mr. IRVINE, Mr. PARKER, and Mr. JEREMIAH WADSWORTH, do prepare and bring in the same.

Monday, January 12.

A memorial of sundry merchants, and other citizens, of the towns of Norfolk and Portsmouth, in the State of Virginia, whose names are thereunto subscribed, was presented to the House and read, praying that the most speedy and effectual measures may be adopted by Congress to obtain restitution for the depredations committed on the property of the citizens of the United States, by the subjects of Great Britain, under the authority of that Government.

Ordered, That the said memorial do lie on the table.

Mr. GOODRICH, from the committee appointed, presented, according to order, a bill supplementary to the act for enrolling and licensing ships or vessels to be employed in the coasting trade and fisheries, and for regulating the same; which was read twice and committed.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from the Attorney General, accompanying a report of such tables of fees and regulations as are proper to be established for the Courts of the United States, pursuant to a resolution of this House of the 5th of June last; which was read, and ordered to be referred to Mr. BODINOR, Mr. KIRKLAND, and Mr. SHREVE, with instruction to examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their opinion thereupon, to the House.

On a motion made and seconded that the Message of the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, of the 30th ultimo, and the report of the Secretary of War, referred to therein, be committed to the Committee of the Whole House, to whom is committed the memorial of the Legislative Council and House of Representatives of the Territory of the United States South of the river Ohio. It was resolved in the affirmative.

Mr. SAMUEL SMITH, from the committee to whom was referred the memorial of Thomas Dannery, made a report; which was read, and ordered to be committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Wednesday next.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act to authorize the settlement of the claim of Samuel Prioleau;" and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported progress.

DEFENCE OF THE FRONTIERS.

A Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, laying before Congress, for their consideration, the copy of a Letter from the Secretary of War, accompanied by an extract from a memorandum of James Seagrove, Agent of Indian Affairs. The Message and papers were read:

Mr. MURRAY then moved that the Message should be referred to the same Committee of the Whole House, to which had been referred the memorial from the inhabitants of the Southwestern Territory.

Mr. NICHOLAS objected strongly to this motion, as showing too much deference to the Heads of the Departments. The paper in question ought not to have been sent to the House at all.

Mr. MURRAY defended his motion. He inquired how the gentleman proposed to get information? Was he to manufacture it himself, or in what way could he better obtain it than from the Heads of the Departments? He had not, for his own part, that species of jealousy of them which the gentleman last up had.

Mr. NICHOLAS repeated his arguments with some warmth. He said that the Letter from the late Secretary at War was not official, but officious. It had a particular aspect which should forbid its getting any such mark of attention. It was neither more nor less than a commentary on some of the proceedings of the last session of Congress. If this was received, we might expect the table to be teaped with such things.

Mr. SEDGWICK could really see no reason to reject the motion. The PRESIDENT had undoubtedly a right to send the communication. The subject was confessedly of the utmost importance. The member asked, if the House were to close their understandings, and refuse all information from that quarter? He repeated that he could see no ground of any sort for refusing consent to the motion.

Mr. GILES was equally dissatisfied with the matter of this letter, and with the manner in which it had been introduced into the House. They were both equally exceptionable. The letter had come without any call. It was an Executive comment on a Legislative proceeding. It was a defence of a measure adopted by the Senate, and it condemned by implication another of that House. To Mr. G. it was a very extraordinary paper. The PRESIDENT was not to be supposed, however, answerable for the propriety of its contents. He should be very unwilling to take any notice of this paper at all. It had been justly remarked that it was a comment on transactions of the last session. A section of a bill passed in the Senate last session, and rejected by the House of Representatives, was inserted in it, and recommented. This paper might operate very materially on the deliberations of the House. This was a very bad precedent. The Executive had nothing to do with any question pending before the Legislature, and consequently had no occasion to send such a thing.

Mr. HOLTEN imagined that the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. MURRAY] had extended his motion too far. It ought to have comprehended only the taking into consideration the Message of the PRESIDENT.

Mr. MURRAY complained of the asperity of expression employed by a gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. NICHOLAS]. Not official but officious, and the intelligence artificial, were phrases to which he objected. The gentleman might have higher sources of information than he had. Mr. M. was willing to take up with information wherever he could get it, and he could have it nowhere with more propriety than from the national servants. It was no good reason to reject information merely because we had not asked for it. Mr. GILES had given a piece of intelligence which Mr. M. said, was to him entirely new, viz. that when the House wanted information, it was one of their rules not to refer for it to the Heads of Departments. The topic was great and important, and the House, before they rise, must examine in general into the situation of the Southwestern frontier, and our terms with the Indians. Mr. M. said that the Delegate from the Southwestern Territory [Mr. WARRE] would certainly be glad to obtain the information conveyed in this paper. If any gentleman would point out any other way by which the House could, without absurdity, get from the PRESIDENT the information contained in this letter, Mr. M. should be willing to adopt it.

Mr. BODINOR was entirely satisfied both as to the propriety of the matter contained in the Letter of the Secretary, and as to the manner in which it had been introduced into that House. That the PRESIDENT had a right to consult the Heads of the Departments, there could be no kind of doubt. Mr. BODINOR then read the following passage from the Constitution: "The PRESIDENT shall be Commander-in-chief of the Army and Navy of the United States, and of the militia of the several States. He may require the opinion, in writing, of the principal officer in each of the Executive Departments, upon any subject relating to the duties of their respective offices." Mr. B. deinde the Message in all its circumstances, and in the most pointed terms. It was perfectly proper, and peculiarly so at this time. By the Constitution, and by the rules and practice of the House, the PRESIDENT had a right to offer his advice regarding Legislative acts.

Mr. W. SMITH had seen much needless jealousy in the House towards Heads of Departments; and the present he thought a refinement on that side. There had been two objections to the communication from the Secretary of War, the one as to the matter, and the other as to the manner in which it was introduced to the House; as to the latter, it was said to have been obtruded unasked. In this last objection Mr. S. saw nothing. He read a precedent from the Journals, which he insisted to be exactly similar, and where Mr. NICHOLAS himself had been one of a committee appointed to examine and report. As to the matter, we might as reasonably object to the Speeches of the PRESIDENT, recommending the House of business which had been before them, or recommending subjects to their notice. He considered the objections of both acts as entirely unfounded.

Mr. MADISON recommended the alteration suggested by Mr. HOLTEN, for restricting the motion of commitment to the Message of the PRESIDENT, and not to take any notice of the letter from the Secretary, which he considered as, in itself, extremely improper. It could not be meant as information, and the House had no occasion to take advice from the Secretary. The letter itself looked more like a forced thing, than any which he recollected to have seen since the establishment of the Constitution. The subject, however, was delicate. The PRESIDENT had an undoubted right to give advice or information in any way which he thought best. It was totally ill-judged in the Secretary to have conveyed his opinion in the very words of a clause in a bill that had passed through the Senate last session, and been rejected in that House. The communication translated into plain language amounted to this: "The Senate last session had more wisdom than this House, and it is proper for this House to reconsider its proceedings, and improve by the superior wisdom of the Senate." Due respect should, however be paid to the Message of the PRESIDENT. It ought to be taken into consideration, and Mr. M. was not willing to cast obstructions in its way, or to make needless objections.

Mr. DAYTON said, that he was for referring the Report of the Secretary at War, with the PRESIDENT'S Message to the Committee of the Whole, and that consequently he was against striking out the words which expressed that intention. If, by omitting to take any notice of the Report of the Secretary, it was meant to reject the information on account of the source from which it came, it argued such a degree of jealousy and distrust as appeared both unreasonable and unconstitutional. If, on the contrary, the object was not so much to reject it, as by the manner of referring the Message, to convey any reproach or disrespect towards the late Secretary of War, Mr. D. should be still more decidedly averse to the modification proposed. He lamented it as an unhappy circumstance for this country, that the gentleman who was lately the Head of the War Department had thought proper to resign. That gentleman had executed the complicated and important duties of his office with zeal, fidelity, and ability, and ought to be protected from any proposition or remark which glanced unfavorably at him, or might wound his feelings at the moment of his leaving us. Mr. D. then introduced the Report of the Secretary of War in 1790, to the PRESIDENT, on the subject of the Militia system, as a striking precedent. The Secretary there informed the PRESIDENT, that he had submitted to him a plan for the arrangement of the Militia. The PRESIDENT sent a Message with the plan to the House of Representatives. What were the steps then taken in that parallel case? Was the Message then alone referred as it is now proposed by some gentlemen? The Journals, on the contrary, prove, that the Message and plan were referred to the Committee of the Whole. It was possible, Mr. D. added, that the present Congress might deem themselves wiser than their predecessors. It was possible that many might think it safest to shut their ears against all kinds of information from the Heads of Departments, or even from the President himself. There might be some who would be willing to free the House of Representatives from certain obligations, or shackles under which the Constitution placed them, by tearing out a leaf from that instrument, but he ventured to say that it was too soon yet to attempt it.

Mr. SMITH complained of the style of the memorial from the Secretary of War, and, as a specimen, he read the following passage:

"It is a melancholy reflection that our modes of population have been more destructive to the Indian natives than the conduct of the conquerors of Mexico and Peru. The evidences of this is the utter extirpation of nearly all the Indians in the most populous parts of the Union. A future historian may mark the causes of this destruction of the human race in sable colors. Although the present Government of the United States cannot with propriety be involved in the opprobrium, yet it seems necessary however, in order to render their attention upon this subject strongly characteristic of their justice, that some powerful attempts should be made to tranquilize the frontiers, particularly those South of the Ohio."

In reading the above extract, Mr. M. went no farther than to the words sable colors. Mr. S. SMITH desired that he should read on, that the House might hear that no insinuation was intended, as if the present Government of the United States had countenanced such ravages. Mr. SMITH said, that he knew what came after, but who would compare the first settlers of North America to the Spaniards, who destroyed in their mines thousands and millions of the Indians, and whose memory had been consigned to the execration of centuries?

Mr. AMES rose. Just when he had begun speaking, there came in a Message from the President by his Secretary. On this, Mr. A. observed, that perhaps, while gentlemen were now speaking there might have arisen a new subject of dispute. Perhaps by the new doctrine, we should reject all communications from that quarter. The Message having been delivered, Mr. A. went on to remark, that turning loose the American militia to guard the Southwestern frontier, was a system of slaughter, of desolation. It was to make a Potter's field of an hundred thousand miles in extent! It was a system to waste the blood of the white man, and to extirpate the Indians. The militia were not the people to prevent those kind of injuries against the Indians which were the cause of hostilities. But gentlemen who were now so delicate as to the style of memorials, would do well, if they extended that delicacy to other memorials which had been preferred to that House, and referred by the consent of those very members to select committees. Papers had been offered to that House, wherein its conduct had been criminated and reprobated in the most unqualified language of detestation. Yet gentlemen, on some of these occasions, showed no resentment. Mr. A. ridiculed the idea of the present motion as introducing a new and dangerous precedent. The opposition to it came exactly under that description, for it was a direct attack upon the principles of the Constitution.

Mr. FITZSIMMONS approved of the motion. It had been asked if the President was responsible for the contents of this Report from the Secretary of War? Mr. F. did not think so; but if he had not communicated it, the member would have thought him responsible for the omission. The President had a right to ask advice from the Heads of the Departments. Mr. F. never knew a Message from the President which required a reference, that had been refused it. As a matter of course, as a matter of right, it ought to be referred.

Mr. MURRAY rose and read that passage in the Report of the Secretary, which Mr. S. SMITH had desired Mr. SMITH to read, and which he had not read. [They are inserted both together at full length as above.]

Mr. NICHOLAS moved an amendment, and which was seconded for striking out the latter part of the resolution proposed by Mr. MURRAY. This made it merely a reference of the Message from the President to the Committee of the Whole, and omitted all notice whatever of the report from the Secretary of War.

Mr. SZODWICK really thought this a squamishness for which he saw no manner of foundation.

Mr. GILES arose.—He said that a gentleman from Massachusetts had a slated that some members considered the whole Constitution as entirely in this House. This imputation was a thing of so serious a nature, that Mr. G. wished the gentleman to point out the person to whom he alluded. If it respected Mr. G. himself the assertion was unfounded. It was not true. He had the highest respect for every branch of the Constitution. This was a charge frequently made by one side of the House. Gentlemen had called the contents of this paper information. He saw in it nothing but what the House knew without the assistance of the Secretary. He considered the report as an effort upon the opinion of this House, as an attack upon its independence, and that in a very indelicate way. He thought the report in all respects unworthy of the notice of the House. He hoped that this paper would not be committed, but that the Message of the President would be so.

[The passage in the report repeatedly referred to as having been borrowed from a bill passed in the Senate, last session, is in these words:

"That all persons who shall be assembled, or embarked in arms, on any land belonging to Indians, out of the ordinary jurisdiction of any State, or of the Territory South of the Ohio, for the purpose of warring against the Indians, or committing depredations upon any Indian town, or persons, or property, shall thereby become liable and subject to the rules and articles of war, which are or shall be established for the government of the troops of the United States."

This was a section of a bill which the Senate passed the last session, entitled "An act for the more effectual protection of the Southwestern frontiers," but it was disagreed to by the House.

Mr. KITTEA considered this as entirely a dispute about words, or plainly about nothing at all. Gentlemen from Virginia were more jealous of the Executive than even the Constitution itself. Mr. K. was satisfied that the President had a right to interfere in the Legislative proceedings with his opinion and advice. There was neither principle nor precedent for the amendment of Mr. NICHOLAS. The dispute was merely about words, because if the Message of the President was referred to a Committee of the Whole, the report in question would, in any case, be referred along with it.

Mr. AMES rose again to make some remarks on the danger of extending too far the privileges of the House of Representatives over the other House. The moment that this House is turned into a Convention, there is an end of liberty. As to impropriety and indelicacy of style, he could wish that the cognizance of members might extend to memorials addressed to the House, that we may not have addresses disrespectful to it. He entirely vindicated the conduct of the President as to this matter, and saw a peculiar propriety in his having made the communication at present on the table.

The question was loudly called for: but Mr. NICHOLAS rose in reply to Mr. AMES. Would any man call this a communication from the Executive? Mr. AMES spoke a few words in a low tone of voice. Mr. N. proceeded, "The gentleman in parentheses," "I prevaricate, sir," rejoined Mr. A. Mr. N. said, that at best he went off from the point. As to the precedent produced by Mr. W. SMITH, it was quite inapplicable. It bore no resemblance or connexion to the one before the House. The other alluded by Mr. DAYTON was, he admitted, in point. But that gentleman would admit that it occurred in the infancy of the Constitution, which was an excuse for it. He hoped that the amendment would go through.

Mr. TRACY quoted something which Mr. NICHOLAS had said. That gentlemen immediately answered, that he had been misquoted. I know, said Mr. TRACY, as well as that gentleman, what he said. Mr. NICHOLAS got up a second time, and repeated what he affirmed were the words which he had really spoken. He did not say so before. said Mr. TRACY, but I am content that he should say so now. I only beg that he may not interrupt me. As to the motion for striking out one-half of the resolution, Mr. TRACY looked upon it as out of all propriety. The President had sent a letter of two lines, enclosing a report from the Secretary of War. To refer the former without the latter, would be like referring to any person the superscription of a letter, but adding at the same time, you must not look at the inside of it. Mr. T. did not care from whom the report came.

If it contained useful information, that was all he wanted to know. And, supposing it had been sent from a Democratic society, that of itself would with Mr. T. be no reason to refuse it a reference. He then observed how much more delicate societies than was now paid by some gentlemen to the President. Much care had been taken that a vote of censure should not be passed on them. It looked as if gentlemen wanted to grasp all power within this body. The amendment was wrong in point both of principle and practice. To refer a mere superscription, (for the letter of the President was nothing more,) would look strange enough. The resolution, as amended, was in a state of hostility with common sense.

Mr. LYMAN was in favor of the amendment for striking out the words in the latter part of the motion. He thought it improper to refer to a Committee of the Whole House the report of the late Secretary of War, because it was of an amphibious nature. It was not a mere official statement of supposed facts, but the reasoning on those facts. He was sensible that precedents could be found on the Journals, which sanctioned a commitment of similar reports; but, for his part, he had ever thought the practice improper, and he must meet the question as it appeared to him. He said, that the Constitution authorized the President of the UNITED STATES, nay, it made it a duty incumbent on him, to give information, from time to time, of the state of the Union. He was also equally required to suggest, for the consideration of the House, whatever he thought expedient; but there was a most material difference between communicating information, and argument or inferences deduced from it. The official information would always, without doubt, be reports from the different Departments, and, therefore, would have the credit and weight which was due to it; but whenever plans or arguments were communicated, they should have the responsibility attached to the signature of the President. What was the case in the present instance? Had the Executive avowed the plan of the Secretary of War, or his reasoning? He was persuaded, from the communication itself, that the President did not at all espouse the report as his own wishes or opinion; for there was nothing in the Message implying that the report had been officially required, or that any one sentiment was from the high authority of the Executive. As to the Secretary of War, Mr. L. had a respect for him, and believed that he had discharged the duties of his office with ability and fidelity, but it implied no censure to decline hearing his arguments. All that the House wanted was facts and information. They were fully competent to the suitable deduction. As to the observation of his colleague, that the House were abridging the powers of the Executive, it was so far from being the case, they were only reclaiming what had been remitted and disused; and he had no fears that they would abuse it.

Mr. HILLHOUSE thought that gentlemen were spending time in a very trifling way. It is the duty of the House to hear information from every quarter. He was against the amendment.

Mr. J. WADSWORTH said, that some gentlemen had been offended at the comparison in the report between the North American settlers and the Spaniards. Mr. W. remarked, that if gentlemen would look into two histories, the one of Virginia and the other of New England, they would see bad enough work. If the Spaniards, or any other nation in history, had acted worse, he was much at a loss to comprehend what their proceedings could have been. As to Pennsylvania, much had been said of the purchases from the Indians of their lands; but where was the difference between shooting an Indian and catching him in a trap? And, as to the conduct of the Pennsylvania men, when they drove the Indians back to Pittsburgh, that was sufficiently cruel. We have murdered them from the beginning, said Mr. W. As to the question on the amendment, he knew perfectly well that the President had acted exactly conformable both to the Constitution and the practice of the House. To refuse committing the report of the Secretary along with the Message, would be an affront, not to the Secretary, but to the President.

Mr. MADISON looked upon the expression, as to the Spaniards, as being extremely exceptionable. It had escaped, perhaps, inadvertently. The Secretary would not have used it in a report to the House, nor would the President have employed it, as from himself, in any Message to the House. Mr. M. was for the amendment. It was natural enough that the Secretary, when communicating his sentiments in a private manner, should make use of illustrations for enforcing his opinion that he would not have adopted in an official paper.

Mr. PAGE was persuaded that the Report from the Secretary of War contained nothing new, or, if new, nothing which may not as well be used when in the hands of members, as when in those of a Committee of the Whole. If the amendment had been to throw the Message under the table, more warmth could not have been shown, in charging the opposers of the motion for reference to a Committee of the Whole with indecency to the President, and with a design at usurpation of his power, &c. It is said, that a jealousy has been betrayed by some members of an encroachment on the privileges of this House. Surely, a most unnecessary and unreasonable suspicion has also been betrayed by others, of a design in the gentlemen who supported the motion of Mr. NICHOLAS, to encroach on the powers of the Executive. Expressions have been used not consistent with decency and order. Gentlemen have been charged with a factious spirit, favoring indecent remonstrances, and with slighting and treating contemptuously the Message from the President. Some members have, at another time, been charged with speaking, not to the House, but to their constituents, in order to gain their votes at an approaching election. Mr. H. said, that his respect for the Government, and for the President, was equal to that of any man in the House. He was far from wishing to reflect on the late Secretary of War. Mr. P. had never, by any vote, censured his conduct, and he entertained no wish for his resignation. But he was at liberty to think the report given to the President wrong, the communication of it to the House as unnecessary, and even if necessary, as sufficiently acted upon when printed and put into the hands of the members. He might have no doubt respecting the Constitutionality of the Message from the President, or of the report of the Secretary to him. He might require no precedents from the Journals to prove that the motion for referring that Message was perfectly in order. But he might doubt whether the substance of the report was of such a nature as to require the consideration of the Committee of the Whole. He might also doubt whether the report was of sufficient importance to require the most mature consideration. There might be circumstances attending the manner of its introduction, as some members allege that there were, which render the report improper to be referred to a Committee of the Whole. It would be a precedent for referring every Message, and that would be attended with unnecessary delay. It will be paying a superfluous compliment. If the information came from the poorest citizen, and was sufficiently important, he would refer it, but though it came from the President or Senate, and contained nothing which, in his opinion, required a commitment, he should vote against it. Mr. P. was for the amendment of Mr. NICHOLAS.

Mr. S. SMITH remarked, that the principal objection made by the gentleman who spoke last, [Mr. PAGE] to the commitment of the report was, that it contains nothing new. The observation will apply with equal justice to a great part of what has been said on the subject before the House. He wished, therefore, that the question might be immediately taken.

The amendment was negatived without a division, but by a very great majority. The motion, as it originally stood, was then put and carried.

TUESDAY, JANUARY 13.

A memorial of Arthur St. Clair, late a Major General in the Army of the United States, in behalf of himself and his son, Daniel St. Clair, an officer in the same Army, was presented to the House and read, praying that the locations which they have made of the respective proportions of land due for their military services during the late war, in one of the ranges of townships on the river Ohio, may be confirmed to them, and grants issued for the same.

Also, the memorials and petitions of sundry officers and soldiers of the late Army of the United States, whose names are thereunto subscribed, of Samuel Brady, of Absalom Martin, and of Dudley Woodbridge, to the same effect.

Ordered, That the said memorials and petitions be referred to Mr. HARTLEY, Mr. GREENUP, and Mr. PELSO WADSWORTH: that they do examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their opinion thereupon, to the House.

PROMULGATION OF THE LAWS.

The House went into a Committee of the Whole on the means of promulgating the laws, Mr. Cobb in the Chair. A great variety of plans were proposed, but none that seemed to meet the general sense of the House. It was admitted that the same mode of distributing the laws which would answer extremely well for one part of the country would not at all suit for some others. To give the copies to be disposed of by the State Legislatures, was recommended by some members. Mr. BALDWIN observed, that this would not answer for Georgia. The books would be landed at the distance of two hundred miles from the town where the Assembly meets. They are carried across the country to that place, instead of being distributed in the counties through which they pass. When they arrive at the seat of Government the Assembly have risen, and probably will not sit again for six or nine months to come.

Mr. BALDWIN said, that rather than see the heart-burning which had existed among the people of Georgia for the last six years, from ignorance of the laws, he would pay a part of the expense of distributing them himself. Mr. B. knew one way by which the Secretary of State might distribute the copies of the laws very effectually in the State of Georgia. This was by intrusting them to the member himself. He was better acquainted than most people with the places in Georgia to which these books ought to be sent, and the persons to whom they ought to be given. He was ready to take the whole business on himself. Mr. HILLHOUSE, who rose sometime after, had no doubt that gentlemen might find it extremely convenient to have the edition of the laws entirely at their private disposal. He had no objections, however, to this scheme.

Mr. PAGE wished not only that the laws might have been printed, but that everything else which passed in that House, and every word which was spoken, might be accurately taken down by a short-hand writer employed for that purpose by the public, and the whole printed and distributed. The people would then be able to judge exactly of the conduct and character of those whom they chose to represent them.

After much miscellaneous conversation it was moved that the Committee should rise, the Chairman reported progress, and asked leave to sit again. The motion was negatived—ayes 41, noes 42. The same motion was again made, some time after, and agreed to. But the motion for leave to sit again was negatived.

It was then moved by Mr. W. SMITH that a committee consisting of a member from each State in the Union should confer on this subject. This was agreed to; and on the motion of Mr. VANS MURRAY, Mr. WHITZ, the member from the Southwestern Territory, was added to the number.

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 14.

A memorial of Parker, Hopkins, and Meert, of the town of Savannah, in the State of Georgia was presented to the House and read, praying the aid and patronage of Congress to enable them to complete a work which they have undertaken for the purpose of making an accurate survey of the sea-coast and inland navigation of the States of South Carolina and Georgia.

Ordered, That the said memorial do lie on the table.

A memorial of George Latimer and others, merchants, of the city of Philadelphia, was presented to the House and read, praying that they may be allowed the drawback of the duties on a quantity of sugar and coffee imported by the memorialists in the port of Newbern, North Carolina, and thence brought to the port of Philadelphia, from which they are desirous of exporting them to a foreign port.

Ordered, That the said memorial be referred to Mr. Fitzsimons, Mr. Goodhue, and Mr. Edwards; that they do examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their opinion thereon, to the House.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the memorial of Thomas Durnery; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had a bill report under consideration, and come to a resolution thereupon; which was twice read, and agreed to by the House, as follows:

Resolved, That the prayer of the said memorial is reasonable, and that the tonnage duties on the vessels therein mentioned be remitted.

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in pursuant to the said resolution, and that Mr. Samuel Surin, Mr. Lyman, and Mr. Van Costlandt, do prepare and bring in the same.

On motion of Mr. Fitzsimons,

Ordered, That a committee be appointed to report a plan for perfecting a road between the Southern and Eastern States, the expenses whereof be defrayed out of the revenue of the Post Office; and that Mr. Fitzsimons, Mr. Giles, Mr. MURRAY, Mr. JEREMIAH WADSWORTH, Mr. BALDWIN, Mr. DEARBORN, and Mr. McDOWELL, be the said committee.

Mr. Fitzsimons, from the committee appointed, presented a bill to authorize the exportation of a quantity of lead, in the ship Pigou, to China; which was read twice, and ordered to be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill entitled "An act to regulate the pay of the non-commissioned officers, musicians, and privates of the Militia of the United States, when called into actual service, and for other purposes;" to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

Mr. Dexter, from the committee to whom was referred so much of the Message from the President of the UNITED STATES, of the 8th instant, as relates to the letter from the Judge of the District of Pennsylvania respecting certain interruptions in the judicial proceedings of that District, made a report; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

PURVEYOR OF PUBLIC SUPPLIES.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act to establish the office of Purveyor of Public Supplies."

Mr. CARNES wished to have some evidence that there was occasion for a Purveyor of Public Supplies, with so large a salary; otherwise, he should think himself obliged to vote against the proposal.

Mr. SEDGWICK, when the bill was first brought in, had approved of it in his own mind, and on conversing with the Secretary of the Treasury, he learned, as the opinion of that gentleman, that it was an extremely economical and very necessary thing.

Mr. B. BOURNE said, that there had been a Message on this subject from the President, on the 11th of December last. This was accordingly read. It had enclosed a memorial from the Secretary of the Treasury, on this establishment, which was also read.

Mr. VENABLE moved to alter one part of the bill. Instead of saying "under the direction and supervision of the Secretary of the Treasury," he thought it better to say under the direction of the Secretary of War. The supplies were for that Department.

Mr. HEISTER seconded this motion.

Mr. FITZSIMONS thought the superintendence better as it stood.

Mr. PARKER moved to strike out the first clause of the bill. He had objections both to the bill itself and to the amendment suggested by the gentleman at his left hand. He thought that a Naval Agent should be appointed, and be responsible to the President only.

Mr. CARNES thought the House had as yet too little information to decide whether the establishment was necessary or not. He believed that he should be disposed to vote with Mr. PARKER, and then for a committee to inquire into the matter.

Mr. SEDGWICK wished that the gentleman would not then begin by destroying the bill.

Mr. CARNES had no such design. He moved, therefore, that the Committee should rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again. This was accordingly done. But leave was not granted. The subject was referred to a select committee.

PUBLIC DEBT.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the report of the committee appointed to prepare and report a plan for the reduction of the Public Debt.

The report having been read by the Clerk, Mr. W. SWIN moved that certain duties therein named should be continued, not to 1801, as proposed in the report of the committee, but that this term should be struck out, and the duties continued till other taxes could be instituted for discharging the Public Debt.

Mr. NICHOLAS said, that since the report had been made, a committee had been appointed to take into consideration the complaints of the sugar and snuff manufacturers, and it was now proposed to make an alteration in the mode of levying the excise on snuff and sugar. Mr. N. had been one of the committee. Evidence had been adduced that the manufacture of snuff was stopped altogether, from the impossibility of carrying it on under the present system of excise. There had been no rise in the price of refined sugar, yet it could not be sold. It laid on the hands of the manufacturers.

Mr. S. SMITH opposed the motion for striking out that part of the report which continued these duties to the year 1801. It had proved extremely injurious to the manufacture. This amendment would perpetuate the law, which was, he hoped, contrary to the design of the gentleman who moved it. The houses where manufactures had been carried on were shut up. We had not, indeed, obtained any information from the officers of the excise, as ought to have been done, in order to learn whether it was possible to collect the excise in this mode or not. Yet, in the face of the evidence of the manufacturers, and without any authority to contradict them, we are going to perpetuate the excise. As to the duty of two cents, it has been proved that this is paid by the manufacturer only, and that he cannot lay it on his customers. Will any gentlemen propose to perpetuate a law, which is to perpetuate the destruction of a manufacture? The sugar bakers of Philadelphia demonstrated to the satisfaction of the majority of the committee that this would be the case. People who now buy loaf sugar, would then buy brown sugar—which ends the affair.

Mr. McDOWELL would rather vote for the repeal altogether, than for the proposed amendment.

Mr. SEDGWICK said, that, during last session, when the excises in question were imposed, much had been said of the impropriety of laying such taxes on the manufactures of this country. In reply, it had been asserted, in the most positive style, that the impost duties would fall infinitely short, and there was even a kind of stigma attempted to be cast on gentlemen who objected to the laying on of these duties, or who doubted that the revenue would fall short. At present we have accounts from all quarters of the ruinous consequences of these excises. The impost, instead of falling short, has been higher than it ever was before. The alleged cause why the new taxes were laid, has proved to be without foundation. This, in itself, is an adequate reason why they ought to be repealed. But there is a second reason, viz: the destructive nature of the taxes themselves.

Mr. FITZSIMONS would not allow that any revenue law could have its effects fairly tried in one or two years. He could not admit that the sugar duty would fall on the manufacturer. He would ask any member of the committee, whether the effects of this tax could be fully understood in three or four months; for that, he believed, was the time during which they had been in effectual operation. As to the quantity of sugar on hand, it may be supposed that when a duty was to be laid on, large quantities would be bought up beforehand. It had also been reported—but he did not pretend to warrant the truth of the report—that there had been a suspension of buying, in expectation that the duty would be taken off. The sugar bakers had the market entirely in their own hands, and he did not believe that the people of America would want refined sugar for the difference of two cents in a pound. He was entirely against any sudden and unwisely repeal.

Mr. GOODHUE did not admit that the tax fell on the manufacturer alone. The merchant, who paid an impost on imported goods, might as well say that he paid the impost out of his own pocket. He could not affirm, but he thoroughly believed, that as much refined sugar was consumed in the country, at this hour, as when the duty was first laid. But the way to save the manufacturers was, to lay another duty upon sugar unrefined. The latter would then be raised equally with the former, and as very little refined sugar is imported, the American sugar bakers would have a complete monopoly. In reply to Mr. SEDGWICK, about the impost, he inquired whether we were afraid of having too much money? It was proper to pay off the Public Debt, and for this purpose it was necessary to collect as much money as could be had in a proper way. The manufacturers of whiskey had alleged that they were much injured by the excise, Mr. G. believed the fact to be otherwise.

Mr. FIDLEY confined himself to the propriety of extending the limitation of excises on snuff, sugar, &c. He said that they had been opposed last session on principle, as laying improper restrictions on the manufacturers, discouraging the fair trader, and extending a precedent that would eventually lead to levying excises on all manufactures; but when the limitation for two years was introduced, as an accommodation, the opposition was so far given up, as that the year and a half were not called; therefore, it was enacted as a law of experiment. He complained that now, before the experiment was made, the limitation was attempted to be extended. He said that the limitation was a pledge of the faith of Government to the public, that the law would not be extended till the experience of its utility and productiveness would justify the measure. He asked where was the report from the Treasury, informing us what was the product of these revenues? There was none. But they had made it appear to the committee, that the snuff excise, as it stood, was impracticable, except as to hand-mills, which never could be productive, and might be wrought in secret and elude the tax, and that the consumption of loaf sugar was greatly decreased. He expected that the snuff law would be rendered practicable. He did not urge that either of them should be repealed now; he only wished that the faith of Government, enacting the limitation, should be supported. He hoped that his disposition to discharge the Public Debt would not be tested by his refusing to extend the limitation. He would discover, on a proper occasion, that he was very willing to pay the Debt, by opening resources of a more general and productive kind. He was not for delaying that business, by depending on small and uncertain excises upon manufactures, which for every forty or fifty thousand dollars they would produce, would raise a new and separate host of difficulties. It was time enough to extend the limitation, when it shall be known what amount is produced, and how it will affect the manufacturer.

Mr. DAYTON was in favor of continuing the sugar excise till the year 1801. He said that two arguments, inconsistent with each other, were offered against it. One was, that the sugar bakers would be forced to pay the excise themselves, which would end in destroying their trade. The other was, that the advanced price of sugar had driven their customers to the use of unrefined sugar. Both accounts could not be true. If the manufacturer paid the duty out of his former profits, the price was not advanced. If he advanced the price on his customer, he did not pay the price out of his own pocket. He would leave gentlemen to take whichever side of the question they pleased. But he did not think it proper that they should occupy a double ground. In one particular passage, he was not sure that he understood Mr. S. SMITH, who explained.

Mr. SPOONER said, he rose particularly to request that his friend [Mr. W. SMITH] would withdraw his motion, for continuing the taxes laid last session, beyond the year 1801; not because he himself should not prefer a longer continuance, but because he had understood that time had been agreed on by the select committee, as a matter of compromise. Mr. S. said, as he was now up, although he had no intention of speaking fully to the subject, he would submit a few cursory remarks. He had expected, when he recollected what gentlemen had formerly said on the subject of the Debt—when he called to mind the public opinion, which he believed no member of the Committee mistook, he had expected an unusual degree of unanimity in the attempt honestly to provide a Sinking Fund. As we progressed in our deliberations, he yet entertained a hope that his expectations would not be disappointed. If the Committee be determined in earnest, to adopt the means of reducing the Public Debt, taxes adequate not only to the proposed reduction, but to the necessary accruing expenses of Government, must be imposed. Without the latter, there could be no well-grounded confidence that the former would be continued. If other taxes could be substituted, less objectionable than those under consideration, they should certainly be accepted. The taxes contemplated were, on loaf sugar, snuff, licenses for retailing spirituous liquors, sales at auction, and carriages. He would not enter into a discussion of the merits of these taxes; he would, however, observe in general, that, in his opinion, the Legislature, in laying these taxes, had either wisely or accidentally hit on those subjects which were among the most eligible. In the continuance of the operation of any tax, probably inconveniences and embarrassment would be felt by those who were directly called upon. Certainly, plausible objections might be made. A change of subjects of taxation was itself a very great evil; and, whenever a change was proposed, the conveniences and inconveniences should be duly considered. To these taxes, generally, it was objected, that they had not the test of experience. The same was also true of any substitute which might be proposed, excepting direct taxes. He hoped, in the progress of this discussion, to find gentlemen sincere. Respecting direct taxes, it was not his intention to speak particularly; he could not, however, omit to declare, that, in his opinion, there was not one gentleman belonging to the Legislature who supposed there was even a possibility, that they could be received as a substitute for those immediately under consideration; for, although there might be individuals within the House, and districts of country, who approved, or affected to approve, direct taxes, as the means of reducing the Debt, yet, both here and there, they were such an inconsiderable minority as, in the opinion of all, rendered it impossible to attempt the expedient. If, then, direct taxes could not be resorted to, to offer them as the Sinking Fund, would certainly create doubts of sincerity. With regard to the taxes on snuff and loaf sugar—respecting which, hitherto, the only explicit objections had been made—they were objects of luxury, and, as such, properly sources of revenue. They were domestic manufactures, it was true, but by our regulations all foreign competition in the sale of these articles was excluded, and the consumer, therefore, would undoubtedly be compelled to pay the tax. Mr. S. concluded, by again requesting Mr. SMITH to withdraw his motion, for the reason before given.

Mr. W. SMITH.—The House having unanimously resolved to make provision for the reduction of the Debt, and the Committee being now engaged on that subject, gentlemen who oppose the resolution under consideration, must either show that the existing revenues are adequate to the object, or propose other revenues more suitable than those recommended by the report.

No gentleman has attempted to do either; their arguments have been only a repetition of censure of the taxes on snuff and sugar. If these taxes are so exceptionable, said Mr. S., strike them out of the report, but do not involve in their condemnation all the other internal revenues. With respect to the duties on snuff and sugar, Mr. S., who had been on the committee, and heard all the complaints of the manufacturers, had not been convinced that they were so oppressive as was represented; indeed, the committee had not advised the repeal of them, which they would have done, had they deemed them oppressive. The snuff manufacturers had stated, as a grievance, the mode of laying the duty, because it subjected them to unnecessary trouble, and was liable to fraud, at the expense of the fair dealer. This the committee had proposed to alter, and to lay the duty on the mortar; he believed that this commutation, with some other regulations which had been suggested by the manufacturers, would remove all their reasonable complaints. As to a duty on snuff being oppressive, he could not believe it. The manufacturers had acknowledged that there were only about one thousand three hundred pounds imported, and there were nearly five hundred thousand pounds consumed in the United States; they might, therefore, be said to have nearly the monopoly of the article; the duty would consequently be paid by the consumer. Snuff was an article altogether of luxury; each individual consumed but a small quantity, and would not, for so trifling a tax, be induced to diminish his consumption. Were it not excised in the hands of the manufacturer, it would escape taxation altogether; if not manufactured here, it would be imported and pay the impost; did gentlemen seriously mean that an article altogether of luxury, and paid by the consumer, who could well afford it, should not contribute something to the revenue, when salt, so essential a necessary of life, and many other articles of necessity, contributed largely? For his part, he had not been able to discover what entitled it to so special an exemption. With respect to the duty on manufactured sugar, many of the foregoing observations would apply; it was an article of which the manufacturers had the monopoly, the duty would consequently be paid by the consumers, and who were of the wealthier class of citizens, and could well afford it; the smallness of it, two cents per pound, would not materially affect the consumption. The manufacturers had indeed complained to the committee that the consumption in this city had diminished since the imposition of the duty; but Mr. S. believed it was attributable to other causes, some of which were of a local and temporary nature; one, the committee had been told, was the quinquiness of some of the Quakers, who had discontinued the use of sugar; this was a local, and he fancied, would be only a temporary obstruction; other causes of the diminution of the sales had been stated by a gentleman, and were by no means ascribable to the duty. Of this tax, Mr. S. would remark, as he had of snuff, that, while salt and brown sugar, which were consumed in large quantities by the poor, contributed to the revenue, it would be as unjust as it would be unequal to exonerate it altogether from its share of contribution; indeed, he did not know two articles more proper for taxation than snuff and loaf sugar. Great stress, however, had been laid on the idea of their being domestic manufactures, and it had been contended, that all such ought to be exempt from taxation. To this doctrine, Mr. S. could not subscribe; for, although he concurred in sentiment that infant manufactures required encouragement and protection, (and they should ever receive it as far as his voice went,) yet, he conceived that the policy and welfare of this country required that full grown manufactures, like those of snuff and sugar, which had the monopoly of the supply, should be resorted to for their share of contribution. This he thought indispensably necessary to supply the deficiency occasioned by the stoppage of importation, and to reach the article in the hands of the consumer. Otherwise, in the event of domestic manufactures supplying us with many of the commodities which are now imported, the duties on which are appropriated to the interest of the Public Debt, there would be a considerable defalcation of the revenue, and a consequent breach of the public faith. He acknowledged that care should be taken not to oppress the manufacturer by severe regulations or by so high a duty as to lessen the consumption. But the mere objection of its being a domestic manufacture was not of itself a sufficient objection; it had not been so considered in the case of the excise on stills, and he trusted it would not on this occasion. So far from its being the prevailing sentiment at the last session, the two laws had passed both branches of the Legislature by a large majority, after hearing all that the manufacturers and the opponents of the tax could allege against it.

No gentleman had suggested any substitute; a land tax had been mentioned out of doors. He should not now enter into a consideration of that species of revenue; he would only observe on the extreme inequality of its operation; some States were still burdened with debt to pay, for which they depended on a State land tax; others were totally clear of debt and laid no land tax; a land tax by Congress would impose a very unequal burden and be very oppressive to some parts of the Union; but, admitting that such a tax should be resorted to, much time would elapse before it could go into full operation; in the mean time, let these revenues which now exist be continued, and whenever a direct tax, or any other, shall be laid, he was content that these should be repealed. The resolution meant no more; it does not go to the perpetual duration of these taxes, as has been frequently repeated; it only proposes that they shall be continued in force until the year 1801, or until some other revenues of equal value shall be substituted. Now, Mr. S. said, if gentlemen were serious in their intention to pay off the Debt, if they were sincerely disposed to put an end to that clamor which the durability of this Debt has excited, let them provide for its extinction by a systematic appropriation of revenues; it was in vain for some gentlemen to wish the Debt discharged, and for others to abuse it; neither their wishes nor their abuse would do any good; the providing the money will be the best evidence of their intentions, and doing that will be considered, by the public, who feel much anxiety on this subject, as the best test of our sincerity.

Mr. SMITH was against the continuance of the taxes for so long a time as that proposed by the amendment.

Mr. NICHOLAS, in reply to Mr. GOODHUE, observed, that if two cents per pound were added to the duty on unrefined sugar, this would not do any more in advance for the raw material. As to the double ground, objected to by Mr. DAYTON, he had a satisfactory answer to that. Mr. N. proceeded to state that the report from the select committee had not been drawn up as was intended by the members of that committee.

Mr. W. SMITH rose and contradicted this assertion. He had been lucky enough to keep the copy of the minutes of what passed in the select committee; and these minutes he read.

H. or R.]

Public Debt.

[JANUARY, 1795.]

Mr. NICHOLAS.—I told the gentleman that this was not agreeable to my ideas. Mr. SMITH could not help that. The thing had been put to the vote, and carried by a majority. Mr. NICHOLAS said, that it was contrary to the opinions of a majority of the committee, and he added some explanations how the report came to be suffered to appear in its present form.

Mr. FITZSIMONS rose to remind the gentleman that it would be both more correct and more decent to confine himself to a statement of his own opinions, than to give those of the select committee.

Mr. S. SMITH, of Maryland, said, that he had understood the meaning of the committee to be exactly as Mr. NICHOLAS had expressed it. The committee would have repealed the duties referred to altogether, if they had supposed themselves to possess full enough information on the subject. Mr. S., in reply to the remarks of Mr. W. SMITH, of people objecting to taxes, and yet affecting to wish for the reduction of the Public Debt, declared that he was one who wished for the payment of the Debt, and, at the same time, for the repeal of the taxes. He took the ground of Mr. SHERBURNE, and said that the continuation of the taxes was unfair. They had been proposed for two years, as an experiment. The experiment has been tried, and all the bad consequences which had been predicted by Mr. S. and others have been verified. Besides, the pretence for laying the taxes has ceased, for the impost has turned out more productive than ever it has been, yet now gentlemen insist on continuing these taxes. He said that this was a deception upon the public. But there was a deception upon deception in the management of this business. There was charged in the estimate for 1795—which he would call an estimate of deceptions—one million three hundred and ten thousand six hundred and nineteen dollars, for a Western insurrection, as if we were to calculate upon an annual expedition to the back countries. This was another deception. There was another deception, or, if the gentleman from Pennsylvania did not like that word, he should call it a mistake. Mr. S., however, had got into a habit of conveying his ideas by those words most apt and significant for expressing them. He proceeded to show, that though there was to be only six hundred thousand dollars demanded for paying the National Debt, yet, that after 1795, there would be an annual balance of one million eight hundred and twenty-two thousand dollars on hand to discharge it. From this he argued that there was no necessity for continuing such pernicious taxes.

Mr. S. had the honor to state last session, that the imposts of 1794 would not be less than those of 1792. The event had justified his assertion. He now, as a commercial man, affirmed that they would equal in 1795 what they had been in 1794. It was probable that they would be still greater. The new taxes might be continued for the two years mentioned in the act, but no longer. What! when manufacturers come, with tears in their eyes, entreating you not to reduce their families to beggary, and while, at the same time, you will have near three times as much money in your hands as will pay the six hundred thousand dollars per annum for the sinking of the Debt, are you in such circumstances to continue the tax? Mr. S. insisted much on the respectable characters of the sugar refiners of Philadelphia, who had solemnly declared that the excise would inevitably extirpate the manufacture; and he adverted, at different times, to an apparent inconsistency, as he seemed to consider it, on the part of Mr. FITZSIMONS, who had admitted that the sugar-refiners of Philadelphia were of a most respectable character, and yet questioned the accuracy of their assertions, in a matter of which they were perfectly competent to judge with precision. He then took notice of some things which had dropped from a gentleman at his left hand. [Mr. GOODHUE,] who had spoken of the effect of excise on Massachusetts, as it was a favorite with the manufacturers. Now, if they can do so well to the Eastward, said Mr. S., with their excises, I would be glad to know what the gentleman sees in me, that he thinks I could not do as well as they. Whatever might be the case in New England, Mr. S. never could be the case under an excise. He had been a friend to the excise on distilleries, because he had thought it a good measure for the country in general, but as to his own distillery, he had never, since an excise was imposed, made five shillings by it. As to his sugar-bakery, it would have the very same termination.

The gentleman who conducted that manufacture for him, (for he must observe, that personally he knew nothing about the matter,) had wrote him that the existence of the manufacture was incompatible with that of the excise. Since the law passed, the refined sugar lay, like a dead letter, on the hands of the manufacturer. It had been said that as much refined sugar was now consumed as had ever been consumed in this country. That he denied. He entreated gentlemen to inquire in their own families, and they would soon be convinced that the consumption of refined sugar was greatly reduced. He expatiated on the injustice, tyranny, and absurdity of the system of sugar and snuff excise. The system was absurd, because the object of revenue would be destroyed. It was in the highest degree unjust and tyrannical. You lay an impost on foreign snuff and refined sugar; gentlemen of capital then set up the manufacture, encouraged by your acts. To set up a snuff manufactory required ten thousand dollars, and a sugar-bakery required ten thousand pounds. Well, you have got manufacturers engaged. Their capital is fixed; and then you come down upon them with an excise that destroys the whole. Mr. SMITH dwelt upon this idea. He did not speak in this way from any view to personal interests of his own, but from a conviction that, in a financial light, such taxes never could be of any service, and would be most destructive to individuals. He thought it sufficient that the House had by one act shut up his distillery; they were now shutting up his sugar-bakery. Some time before he had done speaking, Mr. W. SMITH observed, that as it was now past three o'clock, it would be better for the member to defer the delivery of the rest of his remarks till to-morrow. Mr. S. SMITH, in answer, said "that the gentleman had a very happy faculty at interrupting him."

The Committee rose, the Chairman reported progress, and the House adjourned.

THURSDAY, January 15.

An engrossed bill to authorize the exportation of a quantity of lead, in the ship Pigou to China, was read the third time, and ordered to be re-committed to Mr. FITZSIMONS, Mr. GOODHUE, and Mr. REARFOOT, with instructions to prepare and bring in a bill to repeal so much of the act, passed at the last session of Congress, entitled "An act prohibiting for a limited time, the exportation of arms and ammunition, and encouraging the importation of the same," as prohibits the exportation of lead from the United States.

The bill, sent from the Senate, entitled "An act in addition to the act, entitled 'An act to regulate the pay of the non-commissioned officers, musicians, and privates, of the Militia of the United States, when called into actual service, and for other purposes,'" was read twice and ordered to be read the third time to-morrow.

The House proceeded to consider the report of the committee to whom was referred so much of the Message from the President or the United States, of the 8th instant, as relates to the letter from the Judge of the District of Pennsylvania, respecting certain interruptions in the judicial proceeding of that District, which lay on the table; Whereupon,

Resolved, That provision be made by law for reviving all suits and processes which were commenced for the District Court of Pennsylvania, which by law ought to have been holden on the third Monday of November last, and all suits and processes which were pending in the said Court, and discontinued by the failure to hold the same; and also, all suits and processes which were pending in any special Court of the said district, the adjournment whereof had been lost by the same; and for giving day to all the suits and processes aforesaid, in the District Court next by law to be holden in the same district.

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in pursuant to the said resolution, and that Mr. DEXTER, Mr. HARTLEY, and Mr. HANCOCK, do prepare and bring in the same.

Mr. LEV, from the committee appointed to inquire whether any, or what, alteration is necessary to be made in the laws respecting lost or destroyed certificates, made a report; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

PUBLIC DEBT.

The House, according to the order of the day, again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the report of the committee appointed to prepare and report a plan for the reduction of the Public Debt.

The second resolution in the report was under consideration of the Committee, and is as follows:

"Resolved, That the several clauses of limitation, in the acts for laying duties and taxes on manufactured sugar and snuff, on licenses for retailing wines and spirituous liquors, of sales at auction, and on carriages, be repealed, that the several acts be continued in force until the year 1801, and that the moneys arising therefrom be appropriated to the discharge of that portion of the Public Debt, which is redeemable by law, subject, however, to a substitution of other duties or taxes of equal value to all or any of the said duties and taxes."

Mr. GOODHUE wished to know whether it was agreeable to the rules of the House, to take a vote on each of the articles in the resolution separately.

Mr. W. SMITH said, that as the second resolution stood, it seemed indivisible. It would be better to take a vote against any particulars that are exceptionable.

Mr. TRACY objected to the general looseness in wording of the resolution. Mr. W. SMITH informed him, that in a report, it was usual to pay less attention to the style, but when the bill itself came to be drawn out, this exception would be removed.

Mr. NICHOLAS moved to strike out the words "sugar and," from the resolution.

Mr. AWES was for continuing them in this resolution. He considered Public Credit as interested in the continuance of these taxes, for assisting to clear off the public burdens. These two gentlemen last up, entered into a kind of digressive discussion respecting what burdens were to be paid by these taxes, and what not.

Mr. VEXABLE.—The question before the House is, whether we should now interpose to continue a law after the end of the two years for which it was originally enacted? One would suppose, from hearing of the debate, that the motion went to the repeal of a law, when it is only to say, that after the expiration of the term for which the law has been enacted, it shall be no longer continued. A gentleman has been pleased to call the voting for or against this law a test of character. Sir, (said Mr. V.) it is a sham test. It is not a test, sir. The gentlemen bring forward means of discharging the Public Debt, which we do not like, and then call the voting for or against them a test of character. The gentleman who said this, will not be able to prove that it is a test of character. Mr. V. said, that the members of his opinion were ready to offer funds. The affair was as well understood without doors, as within doors. Is it now necessary to continue these laws? Is it at present requisite to prolong the term of their duration?

Mr. TRACY.—In New York the demand for refined sugar has been greater since the tax was laid, than it had been before it; unrefined sugars are cheaper by twenty per cent than when the tax was laid on. He did not say that the tax had caused the augmentation of demand, but the augmentation had not been prevented by the tax. He said this on the authority of a most respectable manufacturer in that State, a gentleman as respectable as any sugar baker in Philadelphia, and this comparison placed the latter in the most respectable point of view. In the little State where

Mr. TRACY lived, it had always been found, that shifting the kinds of taxes was hurtful. Mr. S. SWINN had said that the consumption of refined sugar was diminished. He believed this assertion to be groundless. [Mr. S. SWINN rose to explain. He had only stated that such was his information from the manufacturers.] Mr. TRACY had understood that the gentleman had said so. He proceeded to observe, that a great deal of the value of a tax consisted in its permanency. Is it not of the utmost consequence that the public should have an idea of its being permanent? Mr. SWINN had stated the hardship to a man of capital, who advanced ten thousand pounds upon a sugar bakery. This seemed to be a good argument, as being drawn from experience, but then other experience had been brought against it. The argument went to the opposition of all taxes, for a farmer might come from Europe, because his land had been taxed there. When he came here, he should perhaps find that one had been imposed in this country. He would then complain, perhaps, that a tax had been imposed, after he has expended his capital.

Mr. MADISON said, that the argument in favor of "permanency," advanced by the gentleman from Connecticut, had force as well as plausibility. But his reasoning would operate against all experimental taxation whatever. It had been said that voting for or against the tariff and sugar excise, would be a criterion of the disposition to pay off the Public Debt. That criterion will not be assumed by those who are to judge the point. The whole dispute is about a branch of the revenue, said to be worth eighty of ninety thousand dollars per annum, an object not of very much importance. The select committee, however, had doubted extremely whether the revenue would be efficient at all. He begged that it might be understood that the question is not, shall the tax be now repealed, but only is it proper that it should be continued beyond the time originally intended, before it has been tried? In answer to what the gentleman from Connecticut had said of "permanency," he thought it would argue greater stability for the Government not to prolong the tax any further, till the end of the period at first stipulated. Experience would, by that time, have assisted in forming a final opinion on the subject.

Mr. GOODRICH said, that a gentleman in New England, a sugar baker, and a particular friend of his, assured him that he looked upon the tax rather as a benefit than otherwise, for it secured a monopoly to the manufacturers, which was a greater advantage than the excise was a burden. He did firmly believe that the consumption would not be lessened by more than one hundredth part by this tax. Rich people only made use of this kind of sugar, and would any member say that they would want it for such a trifle? He challenged any member to show that the consumption had been lessened by the tax. He was amazed that gentlemen should make such a bugbear of two cents per pound. If Mr. G. believed that the matter would end in the ruin of the sugar baking business, he would be the last man to vote for continuing it. But he could not imagine that this would be the case. Mr. S. SWINN had said, that distilleries in Maryland were stopped, but he had not told the reason. Molasses could not be got as formerly, by the manufacturers of Maryland from the French West Indies, and so the distilleries could not go on for that reason. He did not, however, mean to affirm that the excise might not also have tended to hurt them.

Mr. FINDLEY said, that by attending to the arguments only, the question before the Committee would certainly be misunderstood. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. AMES] bends the force of his argument against a repeal of the excise on loaf sugar and snuff. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TRACY] argues as if we were about originating a revenue law, though neither the one nor the other is the case. The law was enacted late in the last session, and did not come into operation till last Fall. A committee of seven members have been appointed to examine its operation. The result of that inquiry is, that the manufacturers have stated great inconveniences and loss, and that no information could be obtained of its having been productive, or even practicable. The committee, convinced that much of the hardship and loss to the manufacturers might have arisen from incidental causes which were perhaps temporary, and that this law had not been long enough in operation to enable the Treasury Department to report on the productiveness of these duties, reported that the limitation should not now be prolonged, but did not think it ought to be repealed till more competent knowledge was derived from experience. Agreeably to the report of that committee, the members opposed to the report before the present committee have argued, that they did not argue for a repeal because their information was imperfect, or chiefly on one side. The present limitation continues the revenue more than two years from this time, for it is to continue for two years and to the end of the next session of Congress. Before it expires, we shall have complete information of its productiveness and utility. Even against next session, the Treasury Department will be able to give information from experience. He said that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. AMES] has with great confidence stated the decision of this question, as a test of the disposition of members to discharge the Public Debt. He did not know that that gentleman had any greater authority to decide on tests than himself; and if he had, he thought his test was ill chosen. To what did it amount? The revenue in question was estimated at ninety thousand dollars, but there was no proof that this estimate would be realized, but rather the reverse. Yet, admitting the revenue to be equal to the estimate, he thought it gave but a very questionable test of the gentleman himself, being zealous for a speedy discharge of the Debt. Extending the limitation five years longer on a revenue of ninety thousand dollars, would make but a very small reduction of the Debt. If the gentleman would be content at present to appropriate the sum proposed to begin the discharge of the Debt with, the time would soon arrive when, having greater experience of the revenue in question, a more substantial test, he hoped, would be offered. He thought it was too late in the session to propose new revenues now. If, when a sufficient experiment was made, it appeared that the excises in question were productive and convenient, much more of the same kind may be had. Many other manufacturers in this country enjoy the benefits of monopoly created by the protecting duties; and if it was judged proper to raise all our internal revenues by excises on manufactures, justice requires that these excises should be more general, and policy requires that the Debt should be speedily discharged. Our commerce, agriculture, and manufactures, are now prosperous; but, as this prosperous state cannot be insured, we ought, in the day of prosperity, to prepare for adversity. But, supposing the system of existing manufactures to be relinquished, or not to be extended, abundant and more productive sources remained to be opened.

Here Mr. AMES inquired of Mr. FINDLEY what taxes he had in view.

Mr. FINDLEY answered, that he had alluded to taxes of several kinds; that at a proper time he would determine. He supposed that no member doubted of the resources of the United States being equal to the discharge of the Debt more rapidly than is now proposed. However, he said, that, for the satisfaction of the gentleman, he hoped that at the proper time, they would both be put to the test, upon a question for a general and efficient direct tax. This he expected they would feel sensibly. It would not be rolling the burden off their own shoulders, and it would more rapidly discharge the Debt. In the mean time, he did not contend to take any thing from, nor did the gentleman attempt to add to it. He only contended to make the limitation a means of deception, by which their constituents had been tantalized. Mr. F. was exceedingly surprised to observe gentlemen who had always found fault with members for discovering a Constitutional jealousy against transfers of power from the Legislature, discover themselves, on the present occasion, so extremely jealous of the next Congress with respect to the discharge of the Public Debt. He asked if the gentleman thought that this House possessed a monopoly of all the virtue of the United States, and that the next House would have no share of it? He hoped that this House would not unnecessarily put the Constitutional power of originating revenue laws, or of changing appropriations, out of the power of their successors.

Mr. McDOWELL found himself called upon to deliver his sentiments on the resolution before the Committee, to appropriate certain duties to the reduction of the interest of the Public Debt. He had already taken the liberty of remarking, on that floor, that he regarded the Public Debt as a public evil. He did not think the resolution before the House any proper test of character, but rather as tending to perpetuate the parties amongst us. At first, the tax in question had only been imposed by way of experiment, and for temporary purposes. Before the operation or productiveness can be known, there is a proposal to make it perpetual. This appeared to Mr. McD. to be impolitic and absurd. He observed that the arguments of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. AMES] went entirely against a repeal of the law. They did not, therefore, apply to the motion of amendment, which went only to prevent prolonging the law, for a repeal of it was not before the House. He wished gentlemen to come forward with some resolutions not only for making payment of the interest of the Debt, but also for payment of the principal, as speedily as the ability of the United States would permit. He was willing, for his own part, to effect so desirable an object by adopting a direct tax, that would operate equally on the citizens of the United States, and which will reach all property that is protected by Government. This is certainly just, since every person in the United States, except such as are concerned in the funds, is interested in the discharge of it. As far as Mr. McD. could learn, the citizens of the United States were willing to make the utmost exertions for effecting so desirable a purpose. Mr. McD. dissented entirely from the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. W. SWINN], who calculates on reducing the Debt in thirty years, which appears to him a reasonable time. Mr. McD. should be very sorry to think that it would not be paid in half the time. It had been said that those who were for the present motion, should bring forward something else instead of the duty on refined sugar. He would gratify the gentleman who made this demand; for, if the amendment went through, he should move a resolution. He proceeded to notice, that in the present infant state of the Government, it would be extremely improper to make taxes permanent before fair experiments had been made of their efficiency. Mr. McD. had hoped that the United States would be instructed by the experience of other nations. He flattered himself that they would have avoided such laws and principles, as had in their nature proved injurious to the rights and liberties of mankind. But to his surprise, when he turned to the history of the British nation, and compared it with that of the United States, he saw that the Public Debt and excises of the former seemed to bear much resemblance to those of the latter, and we are pursuing the like wrong measures as they have done.

Mr. HULLHOUSE readily admitted that all taxes were at first, in some degree, experimental. He had yesterday heard something from Mr. S. SWINN, which hurt him exceedingly. That gentleman had asserted that in drawing up the report from the select committee there had been a "take in." Now, he denied that there had been a "take in." The report was fairly drawn, agreeably to the sense of the majority of that committee. It had been said, that the report was a kind of compromise between the gentlemen in the committee, who were of opposite opinions. There could be no such thing as a compromise with the members who opposed these taxes. The opposition had been from the beginning too violent to admit of

Mr. HULLHOUSE readily admitted that all taxes were at first, in some degree, experimental. He had yesterday heard something from Mr. S. SWINN, which hurt him exceedingly. That gentleman had asserted that in drawing up the report from the select committee there had been a "take in." Now, he denied that there had been a "take in." The report was fairly drawn, agreeably to the sense of the majority of that committee. It had been said, that the report was a kind of compromise between the gentlemen in the committee, who were of opposite opinions. There could be no such thing as a compromise with the members who opposed these taxes. The opposition had been from the beginning too violent to admit of any compromise. In the last session, when the bill for these new taxes was first brought in, there had been a very peculiar vote upon it. It was at first proposed to refuse the bill a second reading. The same gentlemen had uniformly voted against it altogether, even after it had received amendments suggested by themselves. What was to be expected from such a committee as that? He wondered only that they did not advise a total repeal of the bill. The same gentlemen who had objected to it in the select committee, were in the number of those who had voted against the bill in all its shapes. This was not a random assertion, for Mr. H. had examined the Journals, and now produced them to prove what he said. With gentlemen so determined, it was impossible to expect any compromise. As to the sugar duty before the Committee, he thought that the merchants had much greater reason to complain of the two and-an-half per cent. of additional impost, than the sugar-bakers of the two cents per pound on their manufacture. That any body should imagine (said Mr. H.) that two cents per pound of advance would reduce the consumption of refined sugar is astonishing to me! Have we not seen refined sugar at sixteen, eighteen, and twenty-two pence per pound, and did any body ever use the less of it when it rose in price? The fact is, that they never thought about the price of it at all, but purchased exactly what they wanted. Mr. H. considered that all that had been said against the tax, as the most groundless clamor that could be conceived. He hoped that the House would take these taxes, and appropriate them as proposed in the report, and thus put it out of the power of any future Congress to repeal them, till they had put others in their place, unless such future Congress should make a breach of public faith, which Mr. H. did not see any reason to look for. It seems, that when once a tax has been appropriated by the Legislature to the discharge of any public burden, this tax cannot be taken off, even by the Legislature itself, without placing another to supply its room. Mr. H. was, therefore, totally against the amendment.

Mr. S. Smith did not know whether he would be in order, (of which he would be glad to be informed from the Chair,) but if it was regular he should like to move the striking out of the whole resolution at once. [Mr. Nicholas immediately rose and withdrew his motion to make room for this new one.] Mr. Smith then proceeded to make his amendment. He took the face of the law as it stood, and every body sees from the face of it, that it is but an experimental law. Why, then, wish to continue it before the experience which has been made, or when the little experience which has been had is directly against its continuation? A gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. Tracy] had said, that when a tax was known to be permanent, manufacturers would make a more permanent arrangement for supporting the payment of it. The argument was strong, but unfortunately it proved too much, for it went alike against the repeal of every tax, since it was only to say, the manufacturers would make a permanent arrangement.

The same gentleman [Mr. Tracy] alleges that nobody complains against the duty on refined sugar, except the sugar-bakers of Philadelphia. The gentleman is wrong. The manufacturers at Baltimore wanted to complain to Congress last session, but Mr. Smith had hindered them from doing so, by representing to them that the law was only temporary; but the present proposal, which, in fact, amounted to making the law perpetual, quite altered the case. As to the sugar-baker from New York, whose information had been advanced by Mr. Tracy, I breakfasted with that gentleman this morning, said Mr. S. He had been enabled to support the excise, by an accidentally cheap purchase of raw sugar, and by a new market for the commodity that had been found at Hamburg. But these advantages were temporary, and in due time, the sugar-bakers of New York would be reduced to a level with those of Philadelphia and Baltimore. In the last of these places, the manufacturers had this year sold their refined sugar at exactly the same price as they sold it last year, so that the two cents of excise were entirely out of their profits. It had been hinted that manufacturers should keep their stocks upon hand, till the market rose, but the sugar-bakers at Baltimore had not strength of capital to go on without selling off. He again adverted to the injustice of the proceedings of the Legislature. In the first place, large protecting duties had been imposed on the importation of refined sugar. In the confidence of this protection, men of capital embarked in the manufacture, which they never would have done but under the faith of this protection. As soon, however, as you have them fairly engaged in the trade, you impose an excise duty, which, in reality, differs nothing from a repeal of the protecting duty. Thus is the protection withdrawn, and thus is the public faith broken. As an apology for this kind of treatment, you stigmatize them with the name of monopolists, a name odious through the whole world. But the cause which Mr. S. was now pleading, did not concern the sugar-bakers only; because, by the same reasoning, saddlers and shoemakers, and every other sort of manufacturers, may expect, in their turn, to be excised. Mr. S. had no doubt but we should soon have an excise upon nails. The tax upon the importation of this article had called forth the genius of the people of America; and, by means of a machine, we can, in this country, make nails cheaper, faster, and better, than any other nation can make them. The natural progress of things, will be to tell the American nailors that they also are monopolists, a name universally detested, and then you go on to excise the genius that you have excited. The gentleman from Connecticut had supposed the case of a farmer coming from a foreign country to America, and that, after he had laid out his money on land, there should be imposed a land tax. But Mr. S. affirmed, that the comparison was not fair. Government had never pledged itself to such a man that no land tax would ever be imposed. The subject was open, entire and untouched; and the farmer, like other people, must take his chance of futurity. But the circumstance, of which Mr. S. complained, was this: It had been understood in America, that a sugar-baker could not be supported, but by protecting duties against the importation of foreign refined sugar. Accordingly, such protecting duties had been imposed, and now, though they were not nominally repealed, the House were, in substance, doing exactly the same thing, they were laying on an excise that shut up the business altogether.

Mr. S. next proceeded to apologize for the warmth of some of his expressions yesterday. He certainly intended no disrespect to the select committee. He had not wished to insinuate that they practiced an intentional deception on the House, in framing the report. He was sorry that anything which he had said could admit of being construed into a reflection. When he spoke of the printed estimates given in to the House, he had as little design to cast a censure upon the accounting officers. He was of opinion that few countries were ever blessed with such officers. He felt the deepest regret that the head of that Department (Mr. Hamilton, present Secretary of the Treasury) was about to quit his situation. It would be long, he feared, before America could put another officer in his place equally fit for it. He then proceeded to review what he had said yesterday on the subject of public accounts. He said that, when a person spoke upon figures, those who heard him were sometimes apt to think that he was in the wrong when he was in the right. He was often apt to be misunderstood, and sometimes no doubt was himself mistaken. Mr. S. said, that yesterday, by an accident, of which he did not wish to mention the particulars, and for which he was not in fault, five hundred thousand dollars had been inserted among his figures more than he knew of. He then went into a detail on the same subject as yesterday. He said, that he still hoped to convince the House, that there would be plenty of money to pay the whole sum proposed, besides a large surplus after striking out the second resolution. He then proceeded to an arithmetical discussion. [He was interrupted once or twice as being erroneous, by Mr. H. in a house.] He remarked, that the subject was entirely new to him. He had never thought upon the estimate till yesterday, and he knew himself to be as liable to mistakes as any other man. He was perfectly open to correction and conviction; and as ready to be convinced as any gentleman on the other side of the question.

When Mr. S. sat down, Mr. Dexter rose, and made a variety of observations.

Mr. Sedgwick, also, and Mr. Nicholas, entered into a dispute concerning some of the calculations of Mr. S. Smith.

Mr. Page said, that he wished the motion had been to strike out the whole resolution, and that members who had spoken had been contented with showing, whilst they were up, why they could not agree to such a motion, and why they preferred the resolution to any other which could occur to them; and that, had such a motion been rejected, then such amendments had been proposed and considered as might occur to those who disapprove of the original resolution; for then the resolution would have been open to a full and free examination in the first instance, and every amendment considered in its turn; but, as the debate has been conducted, the attention of members has been distracted, and called to such a variety of subjects that the debate has been confused and too much lengthened; and the amendment now proposed must confine members who regard order, from stating their opinions as fully as those who have spoken on the several preceding questions, and have not confined themselves to order. I shall, however, confine myself to the consideration of the question immediately before us, which is, in fact, whether manufactured sugar shall be excised till the year 1801, for the purpose of raising a fund to pay off that part of the Debt of the United States, which pays an interest of six per cent. instead of being excised only to the end of the session of 1795, and applied to certain temporary purposes. As I voted against the excise on sugar in the last session, when it was stated as absolutely necessary on account of a pressing emergency, an expected war, and a consequent defalcation of the revenue which had been drawn from impost and tonnage; and then stated my objections as founded on the impropriety of taxing an infant valuable branch of manufacture, not only as impolitic, but as partial and inconsistent with the practice of Congress, which had been to encourage every branch of the manufactures of the United States; and even if there had not been this impropriety in the measure then, I thought it unnecessary, because I saw no danger of being involved in a war; and if there had been such danger, I looked to less exceptionable objects of taxation;—I cannot but vote now against an absolutely unnecessary continuance of that excise. I am every day confirmed in my opinion, that it is impolitic, unjust, and contrary to Republican principles, to select particular objects for taxation, as it must breed discontent, and may be abused to the ruin of individuals who may be selected as persons on whom a burden of taxes shall fall; it is a temptation to a Legislature to an act of oppression; because, as in the case before us, the persons injured are but few, and therefore their complaints will be disregarded; and it may happen that some persons may not be affected by the duty on excise as others are, for persons with large capitals may be benefited, whilst the poorer manufacturers may be forced to abandon the manufacture. The taxes of a Republic ought to bear equally on all its members; that is, in exact proportion to their property. I am restrained by the question at present from saying anything respecting the excise on snuff, and the tax on licenses for retailing wines and spirituous liquor, on sales at auction, and on carriages, and therefore will only remark, that the duties and taxes enumerated in the resolution before us, are all highly exceptionable; and therefore, no attempt ought now to be made to continue them beyond the time to which they were limited; to strike out the whole resolution will be to continue them according to their appropriation; to agree to the resolution will be an alteration of our ap-Propriation, and to apply an uncertain fund which was relied on in an emergency for temporary purposes, to an important permanent purpose, which must require the best known and most productive funds. I shall therefore vote for striking out the word "sugar," and, indeed, the whole resolution.

By this time it had been repeatedly moved that the Committee should rise, and the Chairman reported progress, which was accordingly done, and the House immediately adjourned.

Friday, January 16.

The bill, sent from the Senate, entitled "An act in addition to the act entitled 'An act to regulate the pay of the non-commissioned officers, musicians, and privates, of the Militia of the United States, when called into actual service, and for other purposes,'" was read the third time, and ordered to be committed to Mr. KIRTELA, Mr. HEATH, and Mr. JAVINZ.

A petition of William Martin, of North Yarmouth, in the State of Massachusetts, was presented to the House and read, praying relief in the case of the schooner Fox, the property of an inhabitant of Nova Scotia, concerned in trade with the petitioner, which was seized by the Collector for the district of Portland, in the said State, as a foreign bottom, under thirty tons burden, importing articles from a foreign port, subject to the payment of import duties, contrary to the revenue laws of the United States. Also, a petition of John Montgomery and Thomas Smith, executors of the late Brigadier General Butler, deceased, who was killed in an engagement with the Indians, in November, 1791, praying that the allowance granted to the widows and orphan children of officers who were killed or died in the service of the United States, during the late war, may be extended to the widow and orphans of the deceased.

Ordered, That the said petitions be referred to the Committee of Claims.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill for the relief of Epaphras Jones and others; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported the bill without amendment.

Ordered, That the said bill be engrossed, and read the third time on Monday next.

Mr. SAWZE SARRIN, from the committee appointed, presented a bill for the remission of the tonnage duties on certain French vessels; which was read twice and committed.

On motion,

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be requested to furnish this House with a statement of the amount of goods on which a duty of seven-and-a-half per cent. was paid, from the thirtieth day of June, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-three, to the first day of July one thousand seven hundred and ninety-four; the amount on which ten per cent. was paid, for that period; and the nett amount of duty on coal, and on coffee and cocoa, for the same time.

Mr. KIRTELA, from the committee to whom was committed the bill, sent from the Senate, entitled

"An act in addition to the act entitled 'An act to regulate the pay of the non-commissioned officers, musicians, and privates, of the Militia of the United States, when called into actual service, and for other purposes,'" reported that the committee had had the said bill under consideration, and made no amendment thereto.

On the question that the said bill do pass, it was resolved in the affirmative.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, stating "that pursuant to the second section of the act establishing the Treasury Department, which expressly makes it the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to digest and prepare plans for the improvement and management of the revenue, and for the support of public credit, he has digested and prepared a plan, on the basis of the actual revenues, for the further support of public credit, which is ready for communication to the House of Representatives."

The Letter was read. Whereupon,

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be informed that this House is ready to receive the communication therein referred to.

PUBLIC DEBT.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the report of the committee appointed to prepare and report a plan for the reduction of the Public Debt.

Mr. FITZSIMONS entered into a series of calculations, and endeavored to show that Mr. S. SARRIN had not fully digested his observations made yesterday on the subject of American finance. He also stated his reasons for preferring the present system of revenue to a direct tax. A person could with much more ease pay two cents per pound on his refined sugar imperceptibly, as he made use of it, than the whole sum of that and other taxes of the same kind together at the end of the year.

Mr. AYES.—It would seem to be a trite, common-place inquiry to ask whether Congress is sincerely and earnestly engaged in the work of reducing the Public Debt? Most persons present would consider the question as the insinuation of a doubt equally illiberal and unwarranted. Every one would say, this article makes a part of my private creed, and of my public duty. Yet, mere speculative opinions and empty wishes for the object will leave it unaccomplished. The path to every great public good is obstructed with great obstacles, and, to surmount them, demands some vigor of exertion, some firmness of self-denial. The Debt, we are told, is unpopular, and this country would differ from every other in the world, if the imposition of taxes is not so too. Yet, without efficient revenues every one will see that the Government cannot reduce the Debt, and, therefore, we have only to choose between evils, or rather between the great evil of an undiminished Public Debt and the inconvenience of those calamities which taxes never fail to raise, though, happily, no country, I believe, acquiesces more cheerfully in the revenue laws than our own.

Gentlemen ought not to be surprised or offended, if we think it at least possible that the difficulties in the way of a powerful operation on the Debt, may prove insurmountable. It is easy and natural to multiply doubts as to the plan of the reduction, as well as to inspire repugnance and apprehension of the taxes and other means of giving it effect. A plan for reducing the Public Debt certainly means a great deal more than paying off $300,000, the redeemable part of the six per cent. stock for once only, and then to drop it till another laborious and contentious effort of the Legislature shall have provided for a second payment. Before we proceed to discuss points in which we disagree, I hope we may state this as one, and the groundwork of the whole, which, in theory, at least, unites all opinions, that we shall now settle a plan for applying year by year the whole strength of the revenues of the nation to paying off the Public Debt; that we shall sanction this plan by law, and give it energy by providing the funds for a sacred and unalterable application to the object. If the opposers of the report of the committee on the plan of reducing the Debt are not willing to go this length, then they must confess they fall short of those with whom I am now acting, and who have usually, on questions of revenue and finance, had my vote; and I confess, this is one of the few occasions in which I had hoped to see an emulation in this House for measures of efficiency and permanency. But that hope, however pleasing, is somewhat checked by the alarming recollection that public debts are in all States the objects of public concern and dread. In Europe, their vast amount has at last terrified those who hold the supreme power, as well as those who pay taxes. Yet, although they have long portended convulsion and ruin, have not nations and Governments nearly smothered their alarms, and, instead of rousing all their energies to subdue the evil, relapsed into a state of security and torpor? Nay, have they not, by madly rushing into war, as we might lately have done, augmented the danger and hastened the shock of that earthquake, which, for an age past, has threatened to throw Europe back again into chaos? The nations seem to have outgrown their fears, or to despair of the remedy, as the inhabitants of Italy whistle unconcerned on the sides of Mount Etna while it vomits fire, or plough the fields of Calabria while they shake under their feet.

These are remarkable facts, and show that, in spite of universal fears and wishes, there is some powerful obstacle in the nature of man, or in the structure of society, that baffles the attempts of a nation to break out of the circle of enchantment and ruin. What is it? Probably this: that wars which create public debts are almost always popular, and taxes that would speedily wipe them out, are no less obnoxious. I hope I shall be pardoned, if I say, and I would say it inoffensively, that the tone and sentiment of the opposition to the temporary taxes have not altogether convinced me that the United States are free from this common malady of nations.

It may be true, that we have less to dread from debt than some of the European nations. The amount is comparatively small, and the progress of wealth and people is every day lessening the share that falls to an individual to be answerable for. The taxes, it may be said also, powerfully stimulate manufacturing industry, as well as increase our shipping, by their operation as protecting duties. But, although the husbandry, arts, and trade of the country have prospered under both debts and taxes; although, while the interest is duly paid, the creditors have no claim to the principal, yet the motives for hastening the reduction of the public burdens are, notwithstanding, so cogent and powerful, they cannot be resisted. In a great measure, overpower the objections to the tax in question.

I am one of those who believe a nation ought to cherish public credit, for the same reason that it ought to have strength; for, in critical situations, credit is strength, and the want of it may happen to be not only weakness, but subjugation and ruin. And it is my belief, that, although it may answer for a time to pay the interest, and neglect the principal, yet, at last, and in the course of affairs, it will appear that a nation which neglects to pay its debts will have no credit. That would be the case with an individual. Besides, if we neglect the interval of peace and prosperity to pay off, lessen, and, if possible, to extinguish the Debt, we cannot expect, for any length of time, to avoid the occasion of adding to it. We have had eleven years of peace, one-half of which term, for want of a Government, our debt was augmenting, at least twelve or fifteen millions of dollars. It has been funded four years nearly, and less than three millions are yet paid off. Are we to hope for peace always? A blessing so great has been hitherto denied, perhaps in benevolence as well as wisdom, to the prayers of devotion and the tears of philanthropy, and, from all we know of the nature and history of man, we have reason to believe, if not to desire, that war will sometimes fall to the lot of a nation. Peace is the time to prepare for it, by extinguishing the burdens of present exultation, and a ground of future confidence and credit, the novel spectacle of a great nation which has freed itself from debt.

There is an auxiliary motive, which I stated in the beginning of the debate. The funding of the Debt has unhappily proved an occasion of division and jealousies in public assemblies. The Debt was not augmented, it was diminished by funding, and almost none of the first Congress declared themselves opposed to funding the Debt. They resisted the assumption and some of the clauses of the bill. The sin and odium, therefore, of the Funding System, as a measure abstracted from the irredeemable quality, and the State debts, ought to have been shared among all the offenders, the Southern as well as the Northern members. Yet it has answered party purposes to represent the Eastern members as the patrons of a system of paper influence, of Treasury corruption, of certificate nobility; that they have attempted and succeeded to pervert and stretch the Constitution, to organize, and uphold systems of concealed aristocracy; that they deem the Debt, as it promotes these vile purposes, a blessing; that they made it to oblige one another, and will not part with it, lest the popular principles of our Government should prevail over the artificial and treacherous schemes and corrupt connexions which, as they derive their life from the Debt, must impart life to it. I forbear, indeed I am unequal to the recital of all the infamies which have been vented on this subject. The language of insinuation and invective has been exhausted. The dictionary and vulgar language can add nothing to the opprobrium which has been attempted to be thrown on the friends of the revenue and finance systems. Do not the ears of gentlemen still tingle with these disgusting recollections? Can they think, without mingled emotions of indignation and surprise, how the labor has been to represent the Eastern members as the authors, the champions, the advocates of a Funded Debt; while every vehicle by which the public could be misled has teemed with declamation that the members from another part of the Union were exclusively zealous to extinguish this devouring fire of Public Debt, that consumes the people and their liberties, that the same gentlemen were not consenting to the Funding System, and that all their efforts have been hitherto baffled by the interested arts of the friends of paper corruption?

I neither know, nor have the arrogance to pretend to know, the inclinations of men's hearts; but, when we are accused of keeping the Debt for influence and corruption; when our accusers affect to lament that they cannot be allowed to prosecute a most powerful and even violent operation for reducing the Debt, we have a right to say that we take the professions of these gentlemen as a ground for testing their consistency, if not their sincerity. When they proclaim their principles, we have possession of them, and have a right to indulge such comments, especially at the instant of bringing them to the touchstone, as I was induced to make on a former day's debate. I own it, sir, I rejoiced to see these professions brought to the test; for, if it should not criminate the sincerity of those who make them, it would at least exculpate those who have so long been the objects of the most licentious invectives. It will show, in the teeth of calumny, that the Eastern members are advocates, and zealous ones, for the reduction of the Debt.

It is true, the opposers of the resolution are not bound to adopt the plan, nor to continue these very duties, but they are bound by more than common sanctions to go even beyond the description of persons whom they have accused, in some plan, and to provide other taxes. No puny operation, no half-way measures will do. They stand pledged for some strong system, some efficient funds to bring into activity at least all the present revenue facilities of the country. It is, therefore, with the best reasons, and even on strong public considerations, that I repeat the observation which seemed to give offence on a former day. The present moment is the crisis of a political test. It gives an opportunity to one set of men, if they choose, to vindicate their consistency; and we, sir, on the other, actually use it, not by profession, but by our conduct, to confound the accusations which have been thrown upon us. I rejoice in this moment on public account. It cannot but undeceive the citizens who have nourished jealousies and prejudices. It cannot be unimportant to say, with one stroke, the slanders, which the gentlemen from the Southern States have assured us have sprung from this source. The confidence and affection of the citizens is the best defence of the Constitution; and we are told that this defence has been chiefly weakened by the misrepresentations which have been made of the intentions of Government to keep the Debt as an instrument of corrupt influence.

If the common object of both sides in this debate be really to reduce the Public Debt, what shall be the plan and the measure of the reduction? Is it to pay off the redeemable part of the six per cent. stock, and to stop there? If so, then we shall go far beyond them. For, why should not the unsubscribed debt be paid off, the registered debt, the foreign debt, the deferred and three per cent. and even the temporary loans or anticipation of the revenue, which, it is agreed, draw an interest of one hundred thousand dollars a year?

That bugbear, the irredeemable quality, so artificially conjured up to terrify the country, opposes no obstacle to the redemption of all this great amount—a mass of debt far exceeding the most extravagant conjectures of the product of the revenue for many years to come. And here let me observe, the argument almost solely opposed to the resolution is this: We have revenue enough, without the temporary taxes. Let it be allowed that we have, for argument's sake, what follows? That we have too much revenue with the temporary taxes. Will our money rust in the Treasury chest for want of debt to employ it upon? Shall we not make greater progress with all the present taxes than with only a part of them? Is it a time to refuse the aid of these temporary taxes when we are finding out a new way for employing the product? Shall we, with any color of wisdom, go on at the same instant to extend our expenses and to diminish the income of the taxes? The argument that these taxes are not wanted is utterly hostile to the professions we make of paying off the public burdens as fast as possible. If the statement to support this reasoning is true, it is not so much an objection as an encouragement to our progress in the plan, as it proves, by the documents adduced on one side, that the other has under-reckoned the calculations of success.

It might seem, therefore, a superfluous labor to show that the Treasury will probably stand in need of the temporary taxes for this operation, since it is all the better if it should not. But, by showing it, at least, it will prove the necessity of assenting to the resolution, if we would have the Public Debt reduced. It is infinitely to be regretted that the facts relating to the Income and Expenditure of the United States are so much in dispute. The law, and, because it is a law, it ought to be a rule of conduct for the House, requires it of the Secretary of the Treasury to digest and prepare plans for the improvement of the public revenue, and relating to the public credit; and, if such information had been called for, it would have thrown a strong light upon many points which have been contested, because they were in the dark. Indeed, at every step in business of revenue and finance, a deliberative assembly will find itself embarrassed; darkness will hide the path. I think as respectfully of this assembly as I ought, and perhaps as highly as any member of it, yet I hesitate not to say, that no assembly ought thus to reject the information which our own law makes it the duty of the Treasury Department to furnish. We often hear of the duty of a Republican to respect the law, and yet, in the teeth of this law, we are exhorted to stop our ears against all communications on these subjects from the Treasury. I am not ashamed to say, I have need of the information, and I see that others dispute on facts which show their want of it. It is strictly Executive business, which, according to the correct theory of our Constitution, ought not to be usurped by this House. Executive officers, on their responsibility, ought to furnish it. The details of a great nation's money affairs are too complex, too vast, too much a science, for any committee to embrace in a report, if they should have the good fortune to understand them. I will not, therefore, under the disadvantages which I believe are common to others as well as myself, pretend to make a systematic parade of figures.

If we reckon on the revenue in 1793 as a ground of calculation for future years, we shall have some guide for our conjectures. Those who choose to imagine a vast increase of income from taxes, in future, may be answered in a word. It is conjecture—1793 was a year of uncommon importation. French property was brought here in almost every vessel, on account of the war with England and the troubles of the French Islands. This swelled the nominal amounts of our imports, and, as much of this property has been re-exported, it again diminished the supposed product of the duties by the allowance for drawbacks; yet, on the whole, it was a productive year, and it could not be thought unfair to reckon our steady yearly income, according to that year, 1793.

Mr. A. then produced a statement of Income and Expenditure, viz:

INCOME.
Duties on imports and tonnage, nett	- $3,500,000
On internal objects	- 780,000
Net produce of the Post Office	- 20,000
Surplus of dividends on bank stock	- 50,000
	$6,350,000

EXPENDITURE.
Interest on Public Debt, foreign and domestic	- $3,100,000
On temporary Loans	- 100,000
Support of Government	- 500,000

Military Department, including military pensions - 1,500,000
Naval Department - 400,000
Light-House Establishment - 24,000
Excess of income beyond expenditure - 726,000

If (said Mr. A.) we apply six hundred thousand dollars to redeem the redeemable part of the six per cent. stock, we shall have only one hundred and twenty-six thousand dollars.

Will any one deny that this dependence is unsafe? that, at any rate, the operation is frittered down to a contemptible scale? If trade should fluctuate, as it may to a very considerable degree, as much as it never fails to do after a raging war, has terminated; if the reduced price of our exports, which, on the event of peace, is inevitable, should reduce our imports, and that is the most natural effect in the world? if new expenses, to which all affairs are liable, should arise, even this puny plan of reducing our Debt would be arrested in its progress.

The statement I have submitted, rejects fractions, and makes no pretensions to absolute correctness. In substance, however, it exhibits such a view of our Income and Expenditure, as I believe cannot be invalidated.

It has been insisted that the question is not on the repeal of the temporary taxes, and therefore the argument is misapplied. This is merely an evasion of the force of it; for is it not the very question before us, whether we will adopt a plan for the reduction of the Public Debt, and whether we will apply to the yearly operation of that plan till the year 1801 these very taxes? The end is, at least, in appearance, agreed on, and we are now looking for the means of effecting it. This is, therefore, precisely the moment to choose or reject these taxes as the means; and in order to induce us to reject them, have not those who say the repeal is not in debate, insisted the taxes alluded to are unfit means; that they are dangerous to liberty, because they are in the nature of excises, dangerous to manufactures, which should not be taxed in their infancy; oppressive, and ruinous? and yet they urge the repeal is not brought ever so remotely under consideration; nay, they tell us, after all this, they were passed on experiment, and they reserve to themselves to wait the result of that trial. Are they who so loudly condemn the temporary revenues, and on such serious grounds, affecting to waver, and to keep in balance till the end of the term for which they were appointed to operate? One advocate for experiment assured us, in the last session, when they passed, that now liberty was lost forever. Does he desire time to bring himself to a liking of these assassins of liberty?

I waive the idea of the known condensation which produced the limitation of these acts to two years. Let the full force of the plea so often urged that they were passed on trial, be essayed. For whom was the experiment intended, for the public or for the sugar-refiners and snuff-makers, and was it to prove that they like or do not like the tax? Did any one who saw their committee expect they would in two years prefer the tax to no tax? Or was the experiment intended for other reasons? If the money was not likely to be wanted at all, it would be one good cause for dropping the taxes; or if the mode of levying the tax was new and uncertain, it would be proper to limit the act in order to produce a revision and improvement of it in that respect. Was the limitation tacked to the bills to see whether they were proper objects of taxation? And was it really doubtful whether snuff and loaf sugar were proper to be taxed? What could be more proper? One is the most trivial of all luxuries, and the other (loaf sugar) is almost if not quite exclusively consumed by the class of citizens who have some pretensions to wealth. Yet when we press hard for a substitute, instead of the snuff and sugar revenue, we are with a face of solemnity advised to tax the land. May I trust my senses? Is it possible for persons to call the taxes on snuff and loaf sugar oppression, and the land-tax relief? Is it possible to think of taking the tax from the snuff-box and the tea-pot, to put it on the plough?

H. or R.]

Public Debt.

If, however, that is intended, as gentlemen assure us it is, there is no time to be lost. It will take two years to organize such a tax, and get it into the Treasury. If a land-tax is to be the substitute, the question therefore really is, shall we repeal the taxes in question. If there had been any doubt before, there can be none in the opinion of those who prefer the land-tax.

The interests of the manufacturer have been strenuously urged, and no one would listen with more attention to any suggestion of injury on their part. If there is any point on which I am more an enthusiast than another, it is on the policy and duty of encouraging manufactures, and on every occasion where their interests have appeared to be affected, my voice has been heard.

But how is the suggested injury to happen? Is the capital of the manufacturer drawn from them to pay the duties? The case of those who pay duties is the reverse. The credits allowed are such as to leave the public money in their hands. Their complaints on that head, if they have any, may be easily satisfied by extending the term of credit.

Another allegation is, that the consumption of the articles is diminished in consequence of the duty. One of the snuff-manufacturers assured me they were not so weak as to imagine the consumers of loaf sugar be terrified by the exorbitant duty of two cents to do violence to their habits and deny themselves loaf sugar? Will they treat their friends with brown sugar? Of all tyrants fashion is the most inexorable. I tell the gentlemen who dread the brown sugar reform, it is not possible. It is not creditable to substitute brown sugar in place of loaf, in consequence of the price, any more than for the same gentlemen to wear frocks and trousers and leathern aprons on account of the impost on superfine cloth.

There is one other view of the interests of the manufacturer. Possibly the mode of levying the tax may be inconvenient and vexatious. If that be the case, who doubts the readiness of Congress to conciliate the interests and even the prejudices of the concerned? Surely not those who remember with what extreme solicitude Congress attempted to reconcile the country to the excise. Surely those who oppose the taxes will not expect the Eastern members, where manufactures are the most extensive and numerous, to be opposers of any plan of accommodation of the manufacturers. They are perfectly sure, and ever have been, of our concurrence in such amendments, and why would they wish to keep the laws hung up in uncertainty for two years?

Is it to secure the power of the next Congress, and why not of the next Congress after that which perhaps may be better still? And why on that ground should any law be passed to continue longer than an Almanac? Is this the idea to be inculcated of the reign of laws, that gentlemen tell us by passing an act for more than two years, we part with our power; and what is the import of this new-fashioned jargon of a power over the laws, instead of the power of the laws? The power to pass laws is not a personal prerogative, it is a public trust, and when the common good, when the attainment of a great advantage for our country, such as the progressive reduction of the Debt, requires a law for ten years, or even longer, is it an argument to say that thus we may lose our personal importance and prerogative?

Shifting, unsteady laws, are a public evil, and they are always felt as such by the dealers in the taxed articles. The first effect of a tax is a little to stagnate and derange the business of the dealers, but soon the current finds its way again, and the tax becomes a part of the price, a part of the settled order of things, which a hasty repeal would derange anew. This argument, it is said, requires that all resource laws should be permanent. Where there is a permanent occasion for taxes, and the proper objects of taxation are known to be selected, the fluctuation of the revenue laws would be an evil, and therefore it would be proper to make them permanent. But when the call for taxes is temporary, or the mode of collection untried, the limitation of the bill to a short period may be no less proper. This objection therefore deserves little attention.

One objection is scarcely intelligible. Why will you urge the permanency of taxes for temporary objects, such as war establishments, frigates, &c.? The answer is, the appropriation is intended for the Debt; for an object that will last, we fear, much longer than the year 1801, the term proposed for the taxes. The taxes are not to be made permanent, nor are the objects of their application temporary. The objectors are wrong in fact.

They are no less mistaken in principle. The temporary taxes were, during the last session, charged with an appropriation of twelve hundred thousand dollars, and one million of dollars also, for the foreign intercourse. These sums are to be satisfied out of the product of the temporary taxes, and the President is authorized by law to borrow on the credit of those funds. The public faith is solemnly pledged, and in express words, (see the appropriation act passed the ninth of June, 1794.) to provide for the principal and interest out of the proceeds of these very taxes, or to substitute other adequate funds in their stead. These taxes are charged in this manner by law, and if we refuse to renew the acts, we are sacredly bound to provide substituted revenues.

[JANUARY, 1795.]

Public Debt.

[H. or R.]

Every one knows that these taxes will not free themselves from the charge in the two years.

How then can gentlemen prevail upon their good sense to assert, that, by continuing the tax laws, the manufacturers are deluded and deceived, when the cause and necessity for such continuance appears on the face of the statute book? How, above all things, can they say, that it is a breach of the public faith to extend them to 1801, when, unfortunately for the sufferer, the public faith is in express words pledged to continue them, or to provide other funds? The assertion has been a subject of no little curiosity, under circumstances so singularly adapted to its confutation.

My own view of the importance of hastening the reduction of the Debt, has led me to suggest answers to as many of the objections as I can recollect. I notice them as they happen to occur to me. One appeal to our pity is made on the score that sugars have risen, and that it is cruel to choose this time for the tax. Why not choose it if the tax will fall, as others do, on the consumers? Do the same objectors desire a relinquishment of the duty on molasses because it is dear, and yet the manufacture of New England rum is unfortunately, from various causes, in a languishing state? Foreign goods are dear, and yet they are taxed. All articles are become dear, and the blind rule contended for would be doubly wrong, if adopted on account of its necessary partiality.

If we regard the experience of other nations, we shall not find cause to dread the destruction of manufactures in consequence of taxes. Is England exempted from them, and yet where do they flourish more? The truth is, in an increasing, thriving society, the taxes are absorbed and distributed over the whole mass of the community. No problem has been oftener debated than where the taxes ultimately fell, and yet experience has invariably refuted the gloomy anticipations of interested theory. The language that infant manufactures are not to be crushed, is more declamatory than correct. They are not to be crushed; nor will the manufactures of snuff and loaf sugar fall, if the operation of the tax should be like that of other taxes, or of similar taxes in other countries.

But is it really desired wholly to exempt the loaf sugar from tax, now the duty on the foreign article has secured an effectual monopoly to the home refiners? Shall the four cents remain on the foreign loaf sugar, and nothing on the home made? If the price should in that event keep up, the consumers would still pay the tax, after its repeal, although the money would not go into the Treasury, but into the pockets of the refiners. I wish their prosperity, but they are too candid and patriotic to desire such an advantage.

A great object is before us, and if, after all, its attainment shall appear to be obstructed by much seeming and some real difficulty and embarrassment, still we owe it to our country, as well as to our own engagements, to proceed. Let us endeavor to overcome the prejudices of the over-apprehensive, and to conciliate the interests of the manufacturers with that of the public. In our other taxes we suppose it is done, and why should it be despaired of in this case? Greater difficulties than any that a calm and unprejudiced mind will discern in the plan before us ought to be expected, and readily acquiesced in, rather than to abandon the great object of freeing the nation from debt. It is worth some exertion and sacrifice. If we should effect it, any hopes of the destinies of our Government would brighten. There is nothing in the magnitude of the Debt to discourage us, and still less in the prosperous circumstances and good dispositions of our citizens. It depends on ourselves whether we realize their expectations by acting in conformity with our own professions.

Mr. S. SAITRA. Mr. Chairman, the resolution on your table reads thus:

"Resolved, That there be appropriated out of the revenues a sum not exceeding $600,000, to be applied to the payment of two dollars on every one hundred dollars of the amount of that part of the Public Debt, which bears an interest of six per cent."

This resolution has passed the Committee unanimously. On what principle then does the gentleman (Mr. Ames) pretend to doubt our intention to provide funds to sink that proportion annually of the Public Debt? I conceive myself committed, and if I cannot prove that we have resources sufficient, without continuing the laws described in the second resolution, I will, however I dislike them, vote for the resolutions. The only subject before the Committee is to provide funds to sink annually the $600,000. The question then resolves itself to this: Is the revenue of the United States sufficient to meet the $600,000 per annum, in addition to the ordinary and known expenditures? Or, does it stand in need of the assistance of those excises now under consideration? The gentleman says it requires their assistance, and states an account when, after paying the $600,000, he leaves a balance of only $126,000. If the gentleman believes in his own statement, he must provide more funds, for surely he would not leave the Treasury with only $126,000 to meet contingencies, and to pay off that variety of debt that he boasts a desire to discharge. The gentleman will do well to confine himself to the subject in question, that is to provide for the $600,000. On this subject he has supplied us with useful information. He says that he has this morning received a statement from the Treasury, which makes the net amount of the duties in 1793, on imposts and tonnage, to be $3,500,000, and that he will always prefer facts to estimates. There we agree. This fact gives $500,000 in favor of my estimate. I had calculated on $5,000,000 only. It was surprising that the gentleman did not make use of other facts, instead of suppositions, which he could have had without going to the Treasury, viz: In 1793, (his year,) the Civil List cost $358,241. The gentleman has charged it at $500,000. Another fact: In 1793, the Military Establishment, including pensions, cost $1,212,631. The gentleman charges that item at $1,500,000. But, sir, there is another item of very considerable importance, which the gentleman seems totally to have forgotten, that is, "An act laying additional duties on goods, wares, and merchandise," passed last session, commenced operation the 1st July, 1794, and which is estimated in the report before us to yield $300,000, but which I have stated will produce $750,000. Add error in Civil List, - 141,769 Sum in Military Establishment, - 287,469 Balance made by Mr. Ames, - 126,000 which makes a balance, after paying the $600,000, of 1,805,238, from which deduct $380,000 contemplated to be raised by the excises, and there will remain for contingencies and for purchases of the Debt, (by the gentleman's own system, and surely a good one, of taking fact instead of estimates for our guide,) the nett sum of $925,238, being about $440,000 more than I had stated. What reason then, at this time, for continuing these laws longer than their time, say until June, 1797, and the end of the next session thereafter, against which time they will more than pay off the sums for which they stand appropriated? For instance, all the revenues to be raised by laws passed last year, were appropriated to pay sundry sums amounting to $1,392,137. Two years of the excises in question are estimated to nett $760,000. One year of the additional duties passed last session, if it yields but $333,000, will satisfy the whole appropriation on those laws. It has been said, that I have not provided for payment of the bank instalments of $200,000, which must commence in 1796. I answer that the select committee had not reported on it. I took the documents they had furnished the House for my government. However, I now answer, that the estimate on your table shows a balance at the close of the year 1795, of $510,000, with which they may pay two and a half years bank instalment if necessary, and, if our funds should not be found adequate in 1797, we must either continue those laws then expiring or supply some other fund; however, I believe that no man can think the funds will be inadequate. It is said, that I am willing to commit the Government for the sum wanted, and to depend on savings to pay. I say that I bring forward solid funds, but I will go farther, and establish the payment by appropriating the revenue arising from the imposts laid last session, which nobody will doubt being sufficient.

Public Debt.

The gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. W.

Sir, I have said, and has been supported by a gentleman from Massachusetts, that Government having encouraged manufactures by protecting duties, have a fair and just right to lay excises on such manufactures, so as to pay for the revenue that Government might have gained, had the articles continued to be imported. This declaration is fair, is candid, and if the system levying excise on the manufactures of sugar and snuff should be continued until 1801, then those who commence any manufactures in future will not have a right to complain, the intention of Government being thus made public. But if this is the system we are to adopt, why not at once lay an excise on all manufactures where the protecting duty has enabled the manufacturer to exclude importation? Why not lay excises on the following, who have excluded the importing of similar articles, and who equally may be said to have obtained a monopoly of the supply of their respective goods? viz: Rope-makers, saddlers, boot-makers, shoe-makers, tanners, curriers, ship-builders, carvers, cabinet-makers, coach-makers, and a variety of others. Or, why not lay an excise on the following, who have in many States obtained the same kind of monopoly? viz: Sail duck-makers, paper-makers, nailors, cotton-manufacturers, glass-makers, hat-makers, watch and clock-makers, brush-makers, cheesemakers, twine-spinners, brewers, and a variety of others? My neighbor (Mr. Goodhue) whispers, because sugar and snuff are luxuries. Granted—yet are they considered necessary by those who use them; and I ask that gentleman whether sugar has not become more necessary to him than anything that can be furnished by either the carver, cabinet-maker, coach-maker, cheesemaker, or even the brewer? No, Mr. Chairman, I will tell you the true reason—because it would have been unpopular and alarming. Begin with two objects called luxuries, whose manufactures are not more than thirty-four in the Union—they are so few they will not be heard. But the precedent once obtained, we can proceed to levy an excise upon all or any other manufacture; for one precedent is worth one hundred fine-spun reasons. Sir, the cause of the sugar-bakers and snuff-makers is that of all and every other manufacturer, for all are attacked through them.

Mr. Madison did not think that the turn which the debate had taken was at all a proper one. The question before the House was only this: whether it was at present proper to prolong the taxes comprehended in the resolution? The House can, for this time, go on without deciding the point. The proper statement of the question hereafter would perhaps be, whether it was better to proceed with excising all those articles of manufacture mentioned by the gentleman from Maryland, or to lay one general and efficient tax on property. The present taxes consisted of two sorts, viz: permanent, as the impost, &c., and temporary, as the excises in question. The permanent taxes could therefore be applied to the permanent object of reducing the Public Debt; and the temporary taxes to the temporary object, as the Military Establishment, &c. Instead of the question asked whether the Public Debt could be discharged by taxes for two years, it would be as proper to ask whether a Military Establishment to which no appropriations could be Constitutionally made for more than two years, ought to be provided for by taxes of indefinite continuance? He did not deny that there might be a reversionary appropriation of such taxes to the Public Debt, after the temporary purpose should have expired. But the practicability of such an arrangement was not a sufficient answer to the objections against making permanent new taxes uncertain in their product, contested in their principles, and which had been adopted under other circumstances for other purposes.

Public Debt.

[H. or R.]

The present subject, he said, in relation to the discharge of the Public Debt, had in every view been extremely magnified. Its importance lay, he thought, chiefly in its leading the attention of the Committee to a comparison of the two general remedies for paying off the Public Debt, namely, excises and taxes apportioned on the several States according to the Constitutional rule, and collected from individuals according to their property. If nothing more was intended than merely to pay the annual two per cent. which the funding law permitted Congress to pay, it was probable the impost alone might yield a competent surplus, without resorting either to excises, or apportioned taxes. But if, as was professed, and as, he hoped, was intended, a great and effective plan was to be sought after, for the purpose of freeing the public from the evil of the Debt with as much despatch as possible, we must then face the alternative of a system of excises, or of a general tax on property. Between these different modes of revenue, a choice was to be made. He pressed it on the attention of the Committee, that if excises were to be preferred, it was in vain to hope they could be limited to a few trifling subjects, such as manufactured snuff and sugar. They must be extended to all the manufactures mentioned by the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. S. SMITH.) The whole country would be covered in fact with excises. Every manufacture must be made to contribute, and even then it would not be possible to draw forth as much revenue as would be paid in the other mode. He was aware that objections and prejudices existed against a tax laid on property. He regretted that such a difference of opinion prevailed, not only in Congress, but in different parts of the Union, on this subject. He was persuaded, nevertheless, that a tax on property was not only a more economical, and in every respect a more eligible resource, than a general system of excises, yielding the same amount of revenue, but that, on the whole, a majority of the people of America would be found less averse to it. He could speak with confidence on this point, as far as his own communications extended. Much, he thought, of the dislike to a tax on property might be removed by taking different objects in different States, as might be most convenient or acceptable to them.

This was perfectly consistent with the Constitution, which did not require uniformity in this instance. In some States a tax on land, in others a tax on other articles of property, or partly on land and partly on other articles, might be most satisfactory; and the tax laws of the States would always assist in digesting the regulations for the purpose. He supposed that if this course should be taken, a million, or even two millions, of dollars or more, could be raised in a year, and that the people would be willing to make such an exertion, rather than be saddled with a permanent Debt; whereas he did not believe that an excise system, if extended to every article manufactured in the country, could be made to produce any thing like such a sum. If, however, he was deceived in this point, and a general system of excises adequate to the purpose should be proposed, and it should be apparent that the general disposition was more favorable to such a system than to a tax apportioned in the manner prescribed in the Constitution, he was ready to give up his objections. Much as he disliked excises, he thought a perpetual Public Debt a still greater evil. But he should much prefer another system, and he repeated the caution, that the alternative was not between a tax on property, and the petty excises in question, which could not be felt in the work of sinking the Debt; but between such a tax and excises spread over a sufficient number of manufactures to produce an equal sum of revenue. He again also suggested to the attention of the Committee that the question was, not whether the laws should be repealed, but whether they should remain as they stood till their merit could be better known, and the whole subject be more fully taken up; and that all that was at this time aimed at with respect to the Debt, would be attained by allotting the temporary part of the revenue to temporary purposes.

Mr. W. SMITH and Mr. DAYTON also spoke each a few words. The Committee then rose, the Chairman reported progress, and the House adjourned.

MONDAY, January 19.

An engrossed bill for the relief of Epaphras Jones and others, was read the third time, and passed.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, accompanying the plan referred to in his Letter of the sixteenth instant, for the improvement and management of the public revenue, together with sundry statements, marked A, B, C, D, E, and F, relative thereto; which were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Ordered, That a committee be appointed to inquire and report on the expediency of erecting a light-house near the entrance of the harbor of Georgetown, in the State of South Carolina.

And a committee was appointed of Mr. WILLIAM SMITH, Mr. GROVE, and Mr. BARTON.

TUESDAY, January 20.

A petition of Tobias Lord, and others, of Kennebunk, in the State of Massachusetts, was presented to the House and read, praying to be reimbursed the expense of erecting a stone pier at the entrance of Kennebec river; and for that purpose, as well as to keep the same in repair, that they may be authorized to collect tonnage on shipping of a certain burden, which shall pass or re-pass the same.

Ordered, That the said petition be referred to Mr. GOODE, Mr. VAN ALLEN, and Mr. WARD; that they do examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their opinion thereupon, to the House.

A petition of Francis Proctor, late Captain of a company of artillery raised by the State of South Carolina, praying that such allowance may be made him for recruiting a number of soldiers and injuries sustained while a prisoner taken by the enemy, when in the actual service of the United States, during the late war, as to the wisdom of Congress shall seem meet.

Ordered, That the said petition, together with the petition of William Seymour, presented the 13th of March last, and the report of a committee thereon, and the petition of Sarah Beacham, returned on the 31st ultimo, by the Secretary of War, be referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. FITZSIMONS, from the committee appointed, presented a bill to repeal part of the act, entitled "An act prohibiting, for a limited time, the exportation of arms and ammunition, and encouraging the importation of the same;" which was read twice, and committed.

Mr. TACY, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was committed the bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act to authorize the settlement of the claim of Samuel Prioleau," made a report which was read.

Ordered, That the said bill and report be committed to a Committee of the Whole House to-morrow.

Mr. GOODE, from the committee appointed, presented a bill supplementary to the act, entitled "An act to provide more effectually for the collection of the duties on goods, wares, and merchandise, imported into the United States, and on the tonnage of ships or vessels;" which was read twice, and committed.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House, on the bill supplementary to the act "for enrolling and licensing ships or vessels to be employed in the coasting-trade and fisheries, and for regulating the same;" and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose, and reported several amendments thereto.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendments, do lie on the table.

Mr. WILLIAM SMITH, from the committee appointed to inquire and report on the expediency of erecting a light-house near the entrance of the harbor of Georgetown, in the State of South Carolina, made a report; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House, on the report of the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Job Stafford; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported a resolution, which was twice read and agreed to by the House, as follows:

Resolved, That all persons who have been, or shall be, placed on the pension list of the United States, by virtue of the law passed on the 28th of February, 1793, entitled "An act to regulate the claims to invalid pensions," shall be deemed to commence the receipt of their respective monthly allowances, at the date of their completing their testimony before the Commissioners who took the same; that no arrears, in any case, be allowed; and that the payment of such monthly allowance be continued during the continuance of such disability.

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in pursuant to the said resolution, and that the Committee of Claims do prepare and bring in the same.

PROTECTION OF THE FRONTIERS.

Mr. FITZSIMONS laid on the table the following motion:

"Resolved, That the President be requested to cause to be laid before the House a plan for the defence and protection of the frontier of the United States, and including the number of troops necessary for garrisoning the same."

Mr. MADISON hoped that the gentleman did not mean to press the consideration of his motion this day. It was of great novelty and magnitude. Mr. M. doubted if it was agreeable to the Constitution.

Mr. VENABLE thought that so many motions of this kind would abridge the business of the House. One day the Secretary of War sends us directions; the second day, the Secretary of the Treasury sends us directions; a third day, we are to have directions from another Department, and so on. He hoped that the House would do their own business themselves.

The question was then put, Shall the House now proceed to consider this motion?

Mr. PAGE did not think himself in want of the information referred to in this resolution. He was entirely averse to establishing of posts. If they are weak, the Indians will cut them off: if strong, they will pass through between them. Any money laid out on them he should consider as cast away.

Mr. DAYTON could not give his assent to the resolution offered by Mr. FITZSIMONS, because it encroached upon the Constitutional powers, rights, and duties of the President, and because it called for information which it would not be prudent or safe for him to give, nor practicable, even if it were safe. To call upon the President to digest and lay before the House a systematic plan which he must thereby in some measure pledge himself to adhere to, for the present year, for the defence of the frontiers; to request of him to inform the Representatives in what manner he intended to exercise the discretion which the Constitution had vested in him as the Executive, was highly improper, and ought never to be drawn into precedent. Mr. D. added, that the resolution was objectionable in every possible light in which it could be viewed. It would be very imprudent to declare to the world the exact number of men which were to compose every garrison throughout our extensive frontiers and country. It would likewise be impossible for any man, even the President himself, to decide, at this time, where it might be necessary to erect forts and establish garrisons, in the interval of time between this and the next session of Congress. The reasons against the measure appeared to Mr. D. sufficiently strong, even without taking into consideration the yet unsettled state of our negotiations with Britain, and the continuance of Indian hostilities, which would give to them additional strength, and of themselves furnish irresistible objections, if no other existed.

Mr. PAKEN would be glad to get such information. He saw nothing presumptuous or unconstitutional in asking this opinion; and he also thought the present a fit time for doing so. If the President, who, like other men, was fallible, gave wrong advice, the House had only to act for themselves. Where we find him right, I hope (said Mr. P.) that we shall support him; where we find him wrong, we will be cautious of adopting his opinions. He thought it particularly requisite to fix this business of the frontier, as far as it can be done, before entering upon the subject of the Public Debt; that we may learn, as near as possible, the amount of the expense to be incurred.

Mr. BOURNOR did not object to the Constitutionality of the resolution, but he had much doubt of its propriety. He moved, as an amendment to strike out the first clause of the resolution, and instead of "the President," to read, "that a committee be appointed to report on the subject."

Mr. FITZSIMONS said, that a committee which went to the same thing had been appointed already. He withdrew his resolution.

WEDNESDAY, January 21.

Mr. DEXTER, from the committee appointed, presented a bill for reviving certain suits and process which have been discontinued in the District Court of Pennsylvania; which was read twice, and ordered to be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House, on the bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act further extending the time for receiving on Loan the Domestic Debt of the United States;" and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said bill under consideration, and made no amendment thereto. The said bill was read the third time, and passed.

Ordered, That Mr. SHERBURNE, Mr. BENJAMIN BOURNE, Mr. WATTS, Mr. BOURNOR, Mr. LATIMER, Mr. WILLIAM SMITH, Mr. NILES, and Mr. GREENUP, be added to the committee appointed, on the 14th instant, to report a plan for perfecting a road between the Southern and Eastern States.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House, on the bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act to authorize the settlement of the claim of Samuel Prioleau;" and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose, and reported an amendment, which was twice read, and agreed to by the House. The said bill, with the amendment, was then read the third time, and passed.

A message from the Senate informed the House, that the Senate have passed the bill, entitled "An act making further provision in cases of drawbacks," with several amendments; to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, accompanying a statement of the amount of goods paying a duty of seven-and-a-half, and ten per cent, imported from the 1st day of January to the 31st day of December, 1793, inclusive. Also, the amount of the duties on coffee, cocoa, and coal, for the same time, pursuant to the resolution of this House of the 16th instant; which were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

PROTECTION OF THE FRONTIERS.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House, on the report of the committee appointed to examine and report what proceedings have been had under the act "for making further and more effectual provision for the protection of the frontiers of the United States," and to report whether any, and what, amendments are necessary to the several laws respecting the Military Establishment, and the protection of the frontiers of the United States.

Mr. DEARBORN read a resolution, the substance of which was, that in considering this question the view should be limited to a defensive system only. This motion produced a very long conversation.

Mr. DAYTON declared that he would never consent to a defensive system only, while Britain was in possession of the Western posts. It would be a wrong policy to reduce the army of General Wayne.

Mr. HARTLEY spoke against the propriety of passing this preliminary resolution. Such resolutions have generally a tendency to embarrass. If, upon consideration, we think the number of troops too large, we may reduce them. But why tell our Southern friends, who are now bleeding, and call upon us to protect and assist them, and desire more offensive operations against their savage neighbors, that we will not comply with their wishes? Our Western army has been successful; and by giving it the proper aid and countenance, we may expect a peace with the Western Indians. But now, to say that we will no longer keep an army; that our troops are to be thrown into posts, and give the field to the Indians, would be highly impolitic. Will this not encourage them to risk another campaign? Will it be prudent to let your posts, far advanced in the Indian country, rely upon supplies to be brought under escorts of militia—militia horse, which costs double the expense of the same number of regular troops? Why should the latter solely depend upon the militia to convey them provisions, when they would be willing to run the risk themselves, if their number was kept up in a proper manner?

Mr. H. was sorry that objections are so frequently made against the legion which has been so useful. It has been said, that regulars were unfit to go against the Indians. Experience has shown us the contrary. The discipline has been fitted to the nature of the service, and has been successful. The regulars had the greatest share in the late engagement, but still we know there were near two thousand volunteers from Kentucky ready to support them. This support is withdrawn; still you wish to weaken this little army. You disorganize it, by leaving no provision for horse in the proposed resolution, which is to follow. It is well known how useful the horse have been in the legion. I think we ought to continue the legion until the next session of Congress. We have reason to believe that the recruiting service, as to part of General Wayne's army, is in a critical situation. We should do nothing to discourage the recruiting service. A late law was passed giving further encouragement to the recruiting service; officers are scattered throughout the Union; but, with this encouragement, and the greatest industry of the officers, we have no reason to believe that the legion will be completed before the next session. Nay, with the utmost countenance, I fear we shall not be able to do more than bring a sufficient number of men into the field against the season for action. I wish for peace; but, to obtain it, we should be prepared for war. I would be for proceeding according to the spirit of the last law, until next session. If we should have peace, or circumstances change, we may then safely reduce the number. I hold the preliminary resolution improper, and shall vote against it.

Mr. SEDGWICK moved that the Committee rise, for the purpose of his making a motion for applying to the President to get information on this point.

Mr. MURRAY could not agree with those who had preceded him, in arguing for the reduction of the army. He was against any reduction of force, as was intended by the resolution, by which the present establishment was to be reduced from 6,000 down to two regiments; it is an abandonment of every sound principle of self-defence known to any nation in a state of war. He considered the resolution in three or four points of view as very interesting. Peace with the Indians in the Northwestern country—British Posts—Southwestern territory—Defence, and generally Posts, or a chain of Forts, on the frontiers. As the reduction of force affected either of these points, he thought it injurious; as it affected the hoped-for peace with the Indians, it was very unsound policy surely to reduce your army at the moment you have gained a victory that entitles you to look for an honorable peace. The only way to reap the fruits of victory was to retain the power of repeating it, if the obstinacy of the enemy shall render repetition necessary. The surest way to lose the profits of your victory is to diminish your decided superiority of force. You would thus, by weakening yourselves, strengthen the enemy; and they would rejoice, if, in the moment when they were defeated, and ready to send the belt, the calumet of peace, they discovered in their enemies a disposition to relax in the efforts by which they had reduced them to humility. The ardor of the distressed warrior will return, when he finds you are tired or unwilling; and we must expect, that if the tribes gain intelligence of this motion, that they will amuse you by signs of peace till they find you have reduced your force, and they will then burst upon your frontier. The feelings which you have excited by victory, though brilliant to you, are such as must have added to their rancor. You may best them into a submission to your terms, but you will never drub them into friendship. In fact, they will watch your moments of relaxation, and avail themselves of your errors. Peace is the object of war, but it is the price of continued exertion and vigilance. All wise nations keep the sword unsheathed until its object is completely attained; and perhaps there is hardly anything more fallacious than the hope which is inspired by victory, if caution and prudence does not complete the business before exertion is relaxed. The British posts present another object. It is unnecessary to say much of them; but when we recollect that they may possibly produce a war, it appears to be the height of impolicy to weaken our means before the end is obtained. The papers on the table show the state of the Southwestern Territory; a considerable force will be essential there. The Creeks either wage war, or threaten it: here is a vulnerable place, to which a memorial of that District has powerfully called the attention of Congress. But supposing a peace already established, and the British posts in possession, he apprehended that the number of posts necessary for the frontier would call for an establishment fully as large as the present. Some one part of the frontier will be always open to attack. Were the Indians a civilized people, reduced into a regular order of society, and under laws capable of promising something like good faith to their engagements, fewer troops would be necessary. We might calculate the less on the necessity of force to watch contingencies and sudden irruptions if compacts had more solemnity and obligation; but they are not to be relied on. They form not a whole nation, nor even a confederated body of nations, except for temporary objects. Each tribe is savage, unconnected, and insulated, so as to exclude the just expectation of permanency and uniformity in the objects or duration of their engagements. So it is, that they will forever think themselves injured, and will for years hold them weak part appears. Of course, you will be obliged, if you mean to defend your frontiers, to keep up posts contiguous to each other, that may repel their incursions.

Mr. SMITH said, that he should vote for the rising of the Committee, for the purpose of obtaining information.

Mr. WADSWORTH (in answer to Mr. MURRAY) said, that the Indians would always have a right to selves injured, and would always have a right to think so, because they always have been injured and always will be injured. The Six nations, it is said by some gentlemen, are now at peace with us. But, when were they at war with us? They have been so used to be robbed and murdered by us, that they submit tamely to it. There was nothing like war lately. The two different nations, whites and Indians, were living together in the same villages. It is true, they had been advised to object to the Establishment at Presqu'Isle: but, if an army had been sent into their country at that time, Mr. W. did not believe that they would have fired a shot. It never could be made out that so many as twenty of them were concerned in the war with the Miamis. He said, that since the day when the first white man landed, the Indians always have been injured. He thought it very proper to inquire for advice on this subject of the President. He is not only a President, but a soldier. He was born and bred on the frontier. He is well acquainted with the Indians, and, independent of his abilities, no man in this House has had more personal opportunities of being a judge respecting them. He was not for reducing the army, but he should very willingly vote for the resolution suggested by Mr. SEDGWICK. He wished the Committee to rise.

Mr. DEARBORN withdrew his motion. The Committee rose, and progress was reported. Mr. SEDGWICK then moved, that the President of the UNITED STATES be requested to direct the proper officer to lay before the House a statement of the number of troops that will be necessary to maintain such a line of military posts as it will be expedient to establish, effectually to protect the frontiers of the United States.

Mr. PAGE said, he saw no material difference between it and that which the good humor and candor of the member from Pennsylvania [Mr. FITZSIMONS] yesterday withdrew; that he hoped the same good disposition would lead the member from Massachusetts to withdraw his; that it was, till yesterday, without a precedent; that nothing but a certainty of unusual dangers from an enemy on our frontiers, it would be thought, could have given rise to such motions. If the President was not called on for the plan of defence, or for his opinion respecting the number of troops necessary for the defence of the frontiers last year, when war raged in that quarter, and we were every day told here that we should be plunged into a war with Britain—why, when the Indians have been chastised into a wish for peace, and no one has an idea of being engaged in a war with Britain, should he now be called on? As to information, it is in the hands of a committee, to whom was referred the President's Message and the Report of the Secretary of War.

After some further debate, the motion made by Mr. SEDGWICK was finally carried—yeas 40, nays 37.

Ordered, That Mr. SEDGWICK and Mr. HARTLEY be appointed a committee to wait on the President with the foregoing resolution.

THURSDAY, January 22.

An engrossed bill for reviving certain suits and process which have been discontinued in the District Court of Pennsylvania, was read the third time, and passed.

The House proceeded to consider the report of the committee appointed to inquire whether any, and what, alteration is necessary to be made in the laws respecting lost or destroyed certificates, which lay upon the table. Whereupon,

Resolved, That any alteration in the act "limiting the time for presenting claims for destroyed certificates of certain descriptions," would be improper; and that all claims for lost or destroyed certificates, not comprehended in the provisions of the said act, ought to be decided on by the Legislature according to their respective merits.

Mr. DAYTON, from the committee appointed to prepare and report a plan further to provide for calling forth the Militia of the United States to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions, made a report, which was read. Whereupon,

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to prepare and report a bill to provide for calling forth the Militia of the United States to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions, and to repeal the act now in force for those purposes.

Ordered, That Mr. DAYTON, Mr. HARTLEY, Mr. BENJAMIN BOURNE, Mr. HARRISON, and Mr. McDOWELL, be appointed a committee, pursuant to the said resolution.

The House proceeded to consider the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act making further provisions in cases of drawbacks;" and the same being read, were agreed to.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act to amend the act, entitled 'An act to establish the Post Office and Post Roads within the United States,'" and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported progress.

Ordered, That the Committee of the Whole House be discharged from the further consideration of the said bill, and that it be recommitted to Mr. SHERBURN, Mr. HARTLEY, Mr. DEARBORN, Mr. McDOWELL, and Mr. GREENUP.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill for the remission of the tonnage duties on certain French vessels. The Committee rose and reported the bill without amendment.

Ordered, That the said bill be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

Mr. TRACY, from the Committee of Claims, presented a bill supplementary to the act concerning invalids; which was read twice, and committed.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the report of the committee to whom was referred the petition of Charles Heems; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported their disagreement to the same. The House then proceeded to consider the said report at the Clerk's table; whereupon, the question being taken, that the House do agree with the Committee of the Whole House in their disagreement to the said report, it was resolved in the affirmative.

The House proceeded to consider the amendments, reported yesterday, from the Committee of the Whole House, to the bill supplementary to the act "for enrolling and licensing ships or vessels to be employed in the coasting trade and fisheries, and for regulating the same;" and, the said amendments being severally twice read, were agreed to by the House.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendments, be engrossed, and read the third time tomorrow.

Mr. PARKER, from the committee appointed, presented a bill for establishing trading-houses for the purpose of supplying the Indian nations within the United States; which was read twice, and committed.

The House proceeded to consider the resolution, reported on the fifth instant, from the Committee of the Whole House to whom was referred the report of the committee appointed to consider and report on the expediency of making any further alterations in the laws of the United States relative to the cession of the jurisdiction by particular States, in lands, where are established, or may, by law, be directed to be built and established, light-houses, buoys, and public piers; and the said resolution being twice read, was agreed to by the House, as follows:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to bring in a bill declaring that cessions of jurisdiction made by any State in lands, where have been erected, or may, by law, be provided to be erected and placed, light-houses, beacons, buoys, and public piers, with a reservation of concurrent jurisdiction, so far as shall authorize the service of the process, civil and criminal, under the authority of such State, shall be deemed sufficient cessions of jurisdiction, in pursuance of the laws providing for the maintenance and erection of light-houses, beacons, buoys, and public piers; and that, where absolute cessions for such purposes have been made, the States who have made the same shall, notwithstanding, be entitled to exercise and retain a concurrent jurisdiction, so far as shall authorize the service of process, civil and criminal, under their authority, within the ceded Territory.

Ordered, That Mr. CORR, Mr. TREDWELL, and Mr. LEE, be appointed a committee pursuant to the said resolution.

Ordered, That a committee be appointed to inquire and report on the expediency of continuing in force, or repealing, the whole or part of the act, entitled "An act prohibiting, for a limited time, the exportation of arms and ammunition, and encouraging the importation of the same." And a committee was appointed of Mr. WILLIAM SMITH, Mr. DAYTON, and Mr. CARRIS.

EXPORTATION OF ARMS.

A bill was read from the Senate, for repealing part of the act for prohibiting the exportation of arms, and encouraging the importation of the same. The House resolved into a Committee, and went through the bill. It was next read in the House, and a motion was made for referring it to a select committee. This was negatived. The bill was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading. The object of this bill was to permit an exportation of lead. Mr. FITZSIMONS said that there was great plenty of lead in the public stores, so that the occasion for which this part of the bill had been passed was at an end.

GOODS DESTROYED BY FIRE.

The House next went into a Committee on the report of the select committee, to whom were referred the petitions of sundry persons, praying to be relieved from obligations for the payment of duties on goods which were afterwards destroyed by fire or other accidents, with instructions to consider and report on the policy of remitting duties on goods, wares, and merchandise, in cases where such goods, wares, and merchandise, shall be destroyed by fire or other accidents.

The Committee, in their report, recommended the following resolution, viz.:

"That provision ought to be made by law, authorizing the Collector of the District to remit the duties on goods, wares, and merchandise, imported into the United States, on its being proven to his satisfaction that they had been destroyed by fire, or other accident, before they were landed, or after they were landed, and before any removal from the places where they may have been landed, within the district for which they were reported to be destined by the entry of the vessel."

The Committee disagreed to this resolution. The Chairman reported progress, and the House adjourned.

FRIDAY, January 23.

An engrossed bill supplementary to the act "for enrolling and licensing ships or vessels to be employed in the coasting trade and fisheries, and for regulating the same," was read the third time, and passed.

An engrossed bill for the remission of the tonnage duties on certain French vessels, was read the third time, and passed.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Epaphras Jones and others," with an amendment; to which they desire the concurrence of the House.

On a motion made and seconded that the House do come to the following resolution:

"Resolved, That a committee be appointed to bring in a bill or bills to amend the act, entitled 'An act for establishing the salaries of the Executive officers of Government, with their Assistants and Clerks;' and 'An act for allowing compensation to the members of the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States, and to the officers of both Houses;' and to reduce all such salaries as, in the opinion of the said Committee, after having made due inquiry, ought to be reduced."

Ordered, That the said motion be committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday next.

Fortifications.

Mr. DAYTON, from the committee appointed, presented a bill to provide for calling forth the Militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions, and to repeal the act now in force for those purposes; which was read twice, and committed.

Ordered, That the Committee of the Whole House be discharged from the further consideration of the said report; and that it be recommended to Mr. SAMUEL SMITH, Mr. DEARBORN, Mr. DAYTON, Mr. PARKER, and Mr. PICKENS.

The House proceeded to consider the amendment proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Epaphras Jones and others;" and the same being read, was agreed to.

Mr. DEXTER, from the committee to whom was referred that part of the Message from the President of the UNITED STATES, of the eighth instant, which relates to the Letter from the Governor of the Territory Northwest of the river Ohio, made a report; which was read, and ordered to be committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday next.

The bill for repealing part of the act for prohibiting the exportation of arms and ammunition, was read a third time. Mr. DAYTON objected, that if the bill was in itself proper, the whole of the old act ought on the same principles to be repealed. It was, therefore, ordered to lie on the table till Monday.

Mr. CLAIBORNE moved that his resolution, laid on the table some time ago, relative to reducing the salaries of certain officers under Government, should be referred to a Committee of the Whole, which was agreed to, and Monday next appointed for that purpose.

FORTIFICATIONS.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the report of the committee to whom was referred the report of the Secretary of War respecting the fortifications of the United States.

The following is a copy of the report above referred to:

"That by the Report of the Secretary of War, it appears that, in pursuance of the act of the last session, the fortifications of the different ports and harbors are in considerable forwardness, excepting only the ports of Boston, and Wilmington in the State of Delaware, suspended for reasons assigned by the Secretary, in his report.

"That contracts have been entered into for the ordnance necessary, and measures taken for progressing in the fortifications as soon as the season will permit. "That, from the necessity of enlarging the plan of defence in some instances, and the enhanced price of labor and materials, since the first estimate was made, a sum not less than $225,600 will be necessary to complete the plan of defence contemplated, admitting the fortifications to be constructed of timber and earth; and if executed with stone, to a much larger sum.

"The Committee, taking into view the circumstances connected with the subject, and having received the necessary information from the Secretary of War, submit the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the necessary works for fortifying the ports and harbors of the United States ought to be continued, and constructed of the most durable materials, so as best to answer the purposes of defence and permanency.

"Resolved, That a sum not exceeding $500,000 (over and above the sums already appropriated) be appropriated for the purpose aforesaid; and that a sum not exceeding $100,000 per annum be provided for the services aforesaid.

"Resolved, That the President of the United States be authorized to give preference, in point of time, to the completion of such of the said fortifications as he may think advisable."

Mr. PARKER moved that the following words should be struck out of the first resolution: "and constructed of the most durable materials, so as best to answer the purposes of defence and permanency."

Mr. FITZSIMONS was in favor of permanent fortifications; for if they were only slight, in three or four years they would be destroyed.

Mr. HAZEN was for reducing the number of fortified places, and making the remainder more complete. He mentioned Alexandria, in Virginia, and Annapolis, in Maryland, as two of the places which he thought it unnecessary to fortify.

Mr. GILES was averse to going into much further expense. He hoped that the clause with the principle which it contained would be struck out. The clause was accordingly struck out.

Another amendment was then proposed, which likewise gave rise to a long conversation. The sum of the subject in dispute was, whether all the places at first proposed should be fortified, and in what way a durable fortification ought to be made?

Mr. GOODRICH at last moved that the Committee of the Whole rise, and the report be referred to a select committee.

Mr. FITZSIMONS imagined that this would be a mere loss of time. It would be doing, as is too often done, getting rid of the business for the meantime, and receiving it back again exactly as we gave it.

Mr. AWES, in making some remarks on the subject, adverted to the present state of Castle William, at Boston. It would, said Mr. A., be much safer to stand without such fortifications than without them.

Mr. SEDGWICK observed, that the account which his colleague had given was perfectly just. No gentleman in that House, perhaps, knew less than he did of these matters, but it required no skill in fortifications to see that those referred to were of very little value. A single ship of war could lay all our large trading towns under contribution. We are more prosperous than any other nation. Surely, then, America may, like other nations, afford to fortify her harbors. He spoke this on account of the public at large, for neither he nor his immediate constituents were in any danger from such a thing.

Mr. DEARBORN admitted that Castle William was capable of very little defence. In fact it was in a state of ruin.

Several other gentlemen also spoke. At length

Mr. S. SMITH insisted that the Committee should rise, as it was evident that they could not at present determine what was meant by a durable fortification. One gentleman understood one thing, another gentleman understood another thing, and so on. They were in fact not doing any business. The Chairman asked leave to sit again, but on the motion of Mr. NICHOLAS, the report was referred to a select committee. The House then adjourned till Monday.

MONDAY, January 26.

A memorial of sundry manufacturers of hemp, in the town of Boston, in the State of Massachusetts, whose names are thereunto subscribed, was presented to the House and read, praying that the drawback of the duty imposed by law on the importation of foreign hemp, may be allowed on the exportation of the same, when manufactured into cordage within the United States.

Ordered, That the said memorial be referred to Mr. GOODHUE, Mr. WARREN, and Mr. HEISTER; that they do examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their opinion thereupon, to the House.

Mr. CORN, from the committee appointed, presented a bill relative to cessions of jurisdiction in places where have been, or may hereafter be, erected and fixed, light-houses, beacons, buoys, and public piers; which was read twice and committed.

Mr. WILLIAM SMITH, from the committee appointed to consider and report on the expediency of continuing in force or repealing the whole or part of the act, entitled "An act prohibiting for a limited time the exportation of arms and ammunition, and encouraging the importation of the same," made a report; which was read: Whereupon,

Resolved, That it would be expedient to repeal the first, second, third, and fourth sections of the said act, and to continue the fifth section in force for another year, so far as relates to the importation of brass cannon, muskets, and firelocks, with bayonets suited to the same, pistols, swords, cutlasses, musket ball, lead, and gunpowder; and for two years longer, so far as relates to the importation of sulphur and saltpetre.

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in, pursuant to the said resolution; and that Mr. WILLIAM SMITH, Mr. DAYTON, and Mr. CLARKES, do prepare and bring in the same.

A memorial of Brothers, Coster, and Company, of the City of New York, merchants, was presented to the House and read, praying that they may be permitted to export to the West Indies, or be allowed the drawback of the duty on a quantity of cutlasses which they imported before the passing of the act prohibiting the exportation of arms and ammunition.

Ordered, That the said memorial be referred to the committee last appointed, with instructions to examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their opinion thereupon, to the House.

Mr. GOODHUE, from the committee appointed presented a bill relative to the compensations to certain officers employed in the collection of the duties of impost and tonnage; which was read twice and committed.

The House proceeded to consider the report of the committee to whom was referred the memorial of George Latimer and others, which lay on the table: Whereupon,

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to bring in a bill authorizing the allowance of a drawback of the duties on such part of the cargo of the ship Enterprise, Herbert Jones, commander, as has been imported from Newbern, North Carolina, and shall be exported from Philadelphia.

Ordered, That Mr. FITZSIMONS, Mr. GOODHUE, and Mr. EDWARDS, be appointed a committee, pursuant to the said resolution.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill, entitled "An act supplementary to the several acts imposing duties on goods, wares, and merchandise, imported into the United States," with several amendments; to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

"The House proceeded to consider the said amendments, and the same being read, were agreed to.

Mr. SHERBURNE, from the committee to whom was recommended the bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act to amend the act, entitled 'An act to establish the Post Office and Post Roads within the United States,'" made a report; which was read: Whereupon,

Ordered, That the said bill and report be committed to a Committee of the Whole House to-morrow.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill supplementary to the act, entitled "An act to provide more effectually for the collection of the duties on goods, wares, and merchandise, imported into the United States, and on the tonnage of ships and vessels," and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said bill under consideration, and made several amendments thereto; which were severally twice read, and agreed to by the House.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendments, be engrossed and read the third time to-morrow.

On a motion made and seconded that the House do come to the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the State of Georgia be reimbursed the amount of a suit of the executors of Robert Farquhar against the said State, for sundry goods sold to the said State, for the use of the troops of the United States, which suit was depending before the Supreme Court at the time of the settlement of the accounts between the United States and individual States, and has been since discharged by the said State giving its obligation for the principal sum of the said suit."

Ordered, That the said motion be committed to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. HEATH, from the committee appointed to inquire and report what progress has been made in the settlement of the accounts of the former Government; what are the unpaid balances on the settled accounts, together with the measures taken for recovering payment of the same; whether any, and what steps have been taken to compel persons to whom public money was intrusted to settle their accounts; and whether any further measures are necessary on that subject; made a report; which was read, and ordered to be committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday next.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill, entitled, "An act to establish a uniform rule of naturalization, and to repeal the act heretofore passed on that subject," with several amendments; to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

The House proceeded to consider the said amendments, and, the same being read, were agreed to.

Mr. WILLIAM SMITH, from the committee appointed, presented a bill to repeal a part, and to continue in force another part, of the act, entitled "An act prohibiting, for a limited time, the exportation of arms and ammunition, and encouraging the importation of the same;" which was read twice and committed.

INVALID PENSIONS.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill supplementary to the act concerning invalids.

Mr. TRACY proposed an amendment which was in substance that every commissioned officer who has received commutation, and who has been, or shall be placed on the pension list, shall not be entitled to receive his pension unless he shall first have returned the commutation which he has received, into the Treasury of the United States.

The amendment was agreed to by the Committee.

Ordered, That the said bill be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

THOMAS PERSON AND OTHERS.

Mr. McDOWELL observed that there was before the House a report of a committee on the petition of Thomas Person and others, proprietors of lands in the Territory of the United States South of the river Ohio. This report was taken up some weeks ago, but was then postponed with an expectation of farther information coming to hand, and this information has now been received. Mr. McD. therefore notified the House, that he should call up that report to-morrow. It was, he said, a subject of considerable importance. He wished gentlemen to turn their attention to it, for a decision appeared necessary, as a great number of citizens in the State of North Carolina, and elsewhere, are waiting with anxiety for a determination.

NATHANIEL APPLETON.

The House went into a Committee of the Whole, on the report of the select committee on the petition of Nathaniel Appleton, a sufferer by fire. The substance of the report was,

"That the sum of ——— dollars be paid out of the Public Treasury to Nathaniel Appleton, to compensate him for his losses by fire during his exertions to save public property, while his own was consumed."

Mr. NICHOLAS wished to know what was the public property saved.

Mr. DEXTER replied that Mr. Appleton was a Commissioner of Loans, and he had saved books and papers relative to the Debts of the United States. What would or might otherwise have been saved, there was nobody who could tell.

Mr. BLOUNT objected to this proposal as a bad precedent.

Mr. TRACY doubted whether the House could properly grant a general kind of thing like this. If it had been possible to specify something worth ten, or a hundred, or a thousand pounds of the property of Mr. Appleton consumed by fire, while he was saving the public property, and which but for that, would have been saved, he might then agree to it, but such a proof was impossible.

Mr. SEDGWICK was for agreeing to the report.

Mr. BOURNOR was against it. The more the consequences of this grant were contemplated, the more dangerous they would appear. If it had been proved that in the case of fire, Mr. Appleton had not given his first attention to the public papers, the Legislature would, in the opinion of Mr. B., have tried some means to get him dismissed. Mr. Appleton had, in his memorial, stated, that his salary was too small, owing to the prodigious advance in the price of living. This was a quite distinct thing from the misfortune by fire. If the salary was too small, Mr. B. was willing to make it larger.

Mr. CHRISTIE wondered that the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. SEDGWICK] could think of proposing such a payment. Not long ago, it was proved that an officer, (Major Rudolph,) had spent an hundred pounds in the service of the public, and had never got payment, and this gentleman refused to pay him. But now, because a man, when his house was burning had taken up an armful of books, and got away with them, you are to pay him. There was no consistency in such things. Mr. C. said that he feared the merit of the claim was affected in this case by the quarter from whence it came. There was no consistency in such opinions.

On a division thirteen members were in favor of the report, which was thus negatived.

The Committee rose, and the House adjourned.

TUESDAY, January 27.

An engrossed bill, supplementary to the act entitled "An act to provide more effectually for the collection of the duties on goods, wares, and merchandise, imported into the United States, and on the tonnage of ships or vessels," was read the third time, and passed.

An engrossed bill, supplementary to the act concerning invalids, was read the third time, and passed.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill, entitled "An act for the ascertainment of certain losses of the officers of Government, and other citizens, by the insurgents in the Western counties of Pennsylvania, and providing some present relief to the sufferers," with several amendments; to which they desire the concurrence of this House. The House proceeded to consider the said amendments; and, the same being read, were ordered to be committed to a Committee of the Whole House to-morrow.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from the Treasurer of the United States, accompanying his account of the Receipts and Expenditures of public moneys, from the first day of July to the thirtieth day of September, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-four, inclusive; which were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. FITZSIMONS, from the committee appointed, presented a bill to authorize the allowance of drawback on part of the cargo of the ship Enterprise; which was read twice, and committed.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act to amend the act entitled 'An act to establish the Post Office and Post Roads within the United States;'" and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported progress.

Ordered, That the Committee of the Whole House be discharged from the further consideration of the said bill; and that it be again recommended to Mr. SHERBURN, Mr. HARTLEY, Mr. DEARBORN, Mr. McDOWELL, and Mr. GREENUP.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter and report from the Secretary of War, made by order of the President of the United States, pursuant to the resolution of this House of the twenty-first instant; which were read, and ordered to be committed to the Committee of the Whole House, to whom is committed the report of the committee appointed to examine and report what proceedings have been had under the act "for making further and more effectual provision for the protection of the frontiers of the United States," and to report whether any, and what, alterations are necessary to the several laws respecting the Military Establishment, and the protection of the frontiers of the United States.

The House proceeded to consider the report of the committee appointed to inquire and report on the expediency of erecting a light-house near the entrance of the harbor of Georgetown, in the State of South Carolina, which lay on the table. Whereupon,

Resolved, That it will be proper that a light-house be erected near the entrance of the harbor of Georgetown, in the State of South Carolina.

Ordered That a bill or bills be brought in pursuant to the said resolution; and that Mr. WILLIAM SMITH, Mr. GROVE, and Mr. BENTON, do prepare and bring in the same.

REDUCTION OF SALARIES.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the motion of the twenty-third instant, "that a committee be appointed to bring in a bill or bills to amend the act entitled 'An act for establishing the salaries of the Executive Officers of Government, with their assistants and clerks;'" and an act 'for allowing compensation to the Members of the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States, and to the officers of both Houses; and to reduce all such salaries as, in the opinion of the said committee after having made due inquiry, ought to be reduced."

Mr. CLAIRBORNE said: A worthy gentleman from Maryland, the other day, suggested an amendment to the proposition now before you, which I understood to contemplate the increase of some salaries; and, if that gentleman can reconcile it to himself and his constituents, let him move and carry it, if he can. For my part, I am pleased with the proposition as it is, and yet it may have great imperfections. It is very common for fond parents to be blind to the imperfections of their own offspring; and, as this is a production of my own, it is probable that I may be under the same delusive prejudices, but I hope that cheerful acquiescence which I have always shown to the majority, has sufficiently evinced that I am no bigot to my own opinions. I said, the other day, that I should be by assassination; but as, in this, a degree of guilt is implied, and might be attended with serious consequences to those concerned in it, I shall be satisfied to give it a fair trial, and, if it must die, that it may be by legal and fair adjudication, or, in other words, after full and fair discussion of its merits.

We now have fairly before us a proposition that contemplates a redress of these grievances, which, since the adoption of the present form of Government, have been a subject of grievous complaint and heartburning amongst the citizens of the United States. Many of them, and, I believe, a very great majority, conceive that the exorbitant salaries established to the Legislative, Executive, Judiciary, and their assistants, are not consistent with, or can possibly contribute to the existence or well-being of a Republican Government, which, in its nature, holds out the idea of equality and justice, but which, in the present mode of administration, cannot fail to have a direct opposite tendency, inasmuch as the very profuse salaries that all who have the good fortune to get places under the pay and influence of the present Administration, if they make a prudent use of them, must ultimately enrich and place them in a situation so far above the vast bulk of the citizens, whose industrious fingers are not permitted a single dip into those very coffers which have been swelled by filching a little from that hard-gotten pittance already far inadequate to the necessary but very ordinary subsistence of their families, as at last to endanger the very existence or shadow of this glorious and dear-bought Government, that has already raised the drooping and once-dejected heads of the poor American citizens, who now glory more in having thrown off that subordinate glory that was assumed and exercised over them under the late detestable Monarchical Government, by their rulers, or public officers, than even in their lives and fortunes. Men begin to know the inherent rights of human nature. They have dipped into and tasted a little of the sweets of political regeneration, and, amongst all classes of your citizens, you may discover a zeal that amounts to enthusiasm, that lives and burns and grows almost to a prodigy. Instances are not wanting, sir, to evince that thousands of those who were not fond of this Government at its adoption, are now, on all occasions, ready to step forth in its support, and the laws that are passed consistent therewith. But this does, by no means, argue that they will submit for ever to repeated abuses of the Government, which may ultimately tend to its overthrow; and exorbitant salaries, with other profuse appropriations of the public money, at a time when the nation is groaning under an immense weight of foreign and domestic debt, which, (calculating upon the blessings of peace, and, of course, a very increasing revenue, not reasonably to be calculated on so long a time,) it is agreed on all hands will take a term not less than thirty-two years to extinguish. They conceive this to be one of those abuses, and, vested with the rights of freemen, closely interwoven with the obligations of good citizens and lovers of their country, have ventured by divers ways, to suggest their disapprobation thereof, in hope that its glaring impropriety would be taken up and removed, as far as the present situation of our finances and the public good will admit. It is true, they have not come forward in the Constitutional mode by petition, &c., but no member in this House, will, I presume, say that they have not heard the loud clamors and complaints of the people on this subject. But perhaps I shall be answered that I am not charged with their petitions to make the proposition, and if I was, that the people are not proper judges whether the salaries complained of are more than adequate, and to prove that some of them have not been so, I shall be told that the allowances to two of your most valuable officers have been so inadequate as to drive them out of your service. To this, I answer, that many other officers, with as large families, and a much less salary, have not abandoned your service—and why, sir? Permit me to answer, because they have probably proportioned their style of living to their quantum of salary, which prudence dictates, or custom has established, through all ranks of your citizens; also whence comes it that twenty-five thousand dollars per annum is not too much for the President of the UNITED STATES? Five thousand dollars is enough for the Vice President, two thousand one hundred and ninety for a member of Congress; and the salaries of many of your valuable officers, who have families, and devote their whole time to your service, are as low as five hundred dollars per annum. Here I shall again be told that the price of house-rent, and every other necessary of life, has increased, and may continue to increase, so as to drive all your officers out of your service. To this, I beg leave to answer, that if you continue such high salaries, or increase them, as in some instances it is asked, and because of the present enhanced price of the necessities of life, I think the evil will increase in proportion to the immense sum of money that you throw into circulation, for a redundancy of that, or any thing else, will always diminish the value; and, if the present custom of disbursing the public money is persisted in, the whole wealth of the United States must shortly centre in and about Philadelphia! But, sir, by the adoption of public economy, we may shortly become able to obviate this great evil, and make our disbursements more diffusive, by paying out money to those who have demands upon your justice, distributed over the United States, if any but those who reside around the Seat of Government have any demand upon your justice or goodness. I am apprised that the proposition is a very unpopular one here, and that many will perhaps knit their brows at me; but, sir, when I entered into public life, it was without any cringing views. I meant not to court smiles, or frowns, and I had no doubt but I should meet my share of both. When I gain the former by proper conduct, I have pleasure in it; when the latter by improper conduct, I am sorry for it. But it will be much to be lamented, if ever we see the day when the people shall be suffered to complain from year to year of any grievance, and their Representatives shall be ashamed or afraid to make those grievances known, or ask redress, lest they be laughed out of countenance, or lose favor at Court. But so hardly am I, if you prefer that expression, that, while I have the honor of a seat in this House, none of those considerations shall ever deter me from stepping forth in their behalf; but be the result of this proposition what it may, I now warn you against evils that may come, as you have been heretofore warned of evils that have come, for the obligations of power and submission are reciprocal. It is as much your duty to pass wholesome laws, as it is the duty of the people to obey them. And now, having done my duty, I shall take my seat content to abide the result, but hope a committee will be appointed.

Mr. NICHOLAS declared that he would be very willing to vote for the appointment of such a committee, if he could see any good purpose to be derived from it, or if the gentleman who laid the resolution on the table could give him any information that tended to prove its expediency. For his own part, he had but a small family, and of that he had left one-half behind him in Virginia, yet he found that his allowance as a member of the Legislature was barely sufficient for supporting this half of his family, though he lived with as much economy as he ever had done in his life. He was certain that he should not take one shilling of public money home with him to Virginia. He requested gentlemen to remember that it was not the present Congress who had given six dollars per day to themselves, but that it had been fixed by their predecessors, and fixed at a time when living was fifty per cent cheaper than it is now.

Mr. BOURNOR observed, that he should not have troubled the Committee on this question, had it not been for several considerations particularly applicable to himself. He was as impartial on the present debate as any member on the floor. After the close of this session of Congress, he never expected to receive a farthing of public money again, and therefore no interest of his own could sway his judgment improperly to object against the resolution on the table. He had been among the number of those members who originally were for fixing the compensation of members of Congress at a less sum than six dollars; not because he thought it beyond the amount of their expenses, but from an idea of the then degraded state of the finances, and that, if sacrifices were to be made, they should begin with this House. He appealed to his uniform conduct for six years past, to prove that he had always opposed an increase of salaries or other public expenses, when the interest of the Union did not require it. He did not doubt that the gentleman who brought forward this resolution, thought he was doing his duty in advocating it; and Mr. B. thought it was equally the duty of the Committee to be convinced that they were not wasting their time in unnecessarily proceeding in business, without having some foundation for rational inquiry. The gentleman had declared that he was led to bring forward the resolution, not from any conviction of his own, for he knew not the officer to whom he could point his finger and say, that he had a greater salary than he deserved, but it was from the voice of the people, who were discontented and clamorous on the subject of large salaries, and particularly the compensation to members of Congress. Mr. B. said, for his own part, he did not believe these objections arose from the voice of the people. Had the gentleman offered any evidence of this to the Committee? That he believed it himself, Mr. B. did not doubt; but this ought not to be sufficient evidence to the Committee. There was none on the table. Not a single petition had come forward to the House on this subject. There was nothing in the complexion of our Government that prevented the application of the people to their Representatives, if they were dissatisfied. They had frequently chosen the same members who voted for this compensation. From whence, then, arose the evidence of the public voice being clamorous against the compensation of the members of Congress?

Mr. B. did not doubt but there were uninformed individuals, who might object to six dollars per day; but he was confident that the well-informed among the citizens of the United States, and those who reflected on the subject, would think (at the present day at least) it was not more than would barely pay the reasonable expenses of gentlemen who attended to their duty here in a proper manner. Almost every article of consumption was from twenty to thirty per cent. higher now than it was at the commencement of the Government. The Constitution of the United States as the act of the people and the public voice contemplated a compensation to the members of Congress. Did not this mean something more than the bare discharge of their expenses? Yet Congress had not gone beyond it.

When Congress sat at New York, Mr. B. said that he was in a situation more favorable in point of expense than any gentleman on the floor, who did not reside in that city. He boarded with a near relation, and was in a manner in his own family; and, although he paid the usual price of boarding as at other places, yet there were a thousand nameless small articles which saved him many advances. He was within sixteen miles of his own family, from whence he received many things that prevented his laying out money. During three sessions he kept an exact and faithful account of his expenditures; and, at the end of that time, the balance was but 43s. 4d.; but on which side of the question his memory did not allow him to say. At present, he was also under very peculiar advantages, yet he was confident that, at the end of the session, he should not have any balance in his favor, from his compensation as a member. Mr. B. appealed to every gentleman's own knowledge, and particularly to the gentleman who made the motion, if he thought that what he received would more than pay his expenses.

Gentlemen were often crying out against an Aristocracy in this country; yet measures of this kind tended to establish one, by reducing the compensation of members, so that no citizen but the rich and affluent could attend as a Representative in Congress. This certainly was the most effectual way of bringing about a dangerous Aristocracy in the United States. Should not men of abilities, though in the middle walks of life, be encouraged to come forward and yield their services to their country, without being dependent on any person or set of men whatever? Is it not sufficient that their time and talents are given to the public? Must they pay their expenses too?

Mr. B. was aware that the resolution proposed related to the officers of Government as well as members of Congress, but he had confined his remarks to the last, as the part of the subject he was best acquainted with. He begged gentlemen to look around and point out the public officer who received more than a reasonable reward for his services. Professional men of the first abilities, were absolutely necessary to carry on the public business; and could any one, fit for his office, be shown who could not do full as well, if not much better, in the exercise of his profession in private life, than he did in the public service, if pecuniary matters were his only object? In short, (Mr. B. said,) this House was placed between Scylla and Charybdis. The public officers were complaining, and even resigning, for want of sufficient compensation for their services; on the other hand, an attempt was now made to reduce their salaries still lower, on the supposed clamors of the people. Mr. B. did not believe they could be denominated those of the people; neither did he see any evidence of the fact. He did not consider the complaints of a few individuals as the public voice. Ought not the gentlemen to come forward with some kind of calculations or estimates to have shown that certain salaries were too high, or more than the services performed were entitled to? This had not been done; but the Committees were urged, at this important moment, to proceed to an inquiry, which every gentleman on the floor already knew as well as he could do by the most laborious investigation. He therefore concluded that, to agree to the resolution, would be a waste of the short time that yet remained of the session, and an unwise measure. Mr. B. would have contented himself with joining the Committee in a silent vote on this subject, but he thought the observations made in support of the measure ought to receive some answer, if not to convince the Committee, yet to satisfy their constituents that there could exist no necessity for a present inquiry of this nature.

Mr. CLAIBORNE begged leave to remind the House that he had never asserted the salaries were too high. His motion went only to appointing a committee for an inquiry whether the salaries were so or not.

Mr. W. SMITH said, that the resolution was, in its present shape, so extremely vague, that one did not know how to give it a definition or a vote. Different objects were lumped together. If, by an inquiry, the gentleman meant to examine into the wages of members of this House, it was quite needless to appoint a committee, because every member can at this moment speak for himself. But Mr. S. did not consider the present time as the most proper for beginning to reduce salaries, when, within the last twelve months, there had been three resignations, viz: the Secretary of State, the Secretary of War, and the Secretary of the Treasury, and all chiefly for one reason, the smallness of the salary. I have no doubt (said Mr. S.) of there being complaints, and, if the salary was reduced to three dollars per day, there would be still complaints, as we see in the case with the members of the Legislature of Pennsylvania. He only wished that the Committee would rise, and he should then vote in the House that they might not have leave to sit again. The mover of this resolution had mentioned the danger of meeting with reproaches from the people, who thought their salaries too high. Mr. S. saw very little in this matter, because the people who railed at the salary of six dollars per day, were only anxious to get in themselves, and embraced this topic as an expedient of ousting those members whom they wanted to succeed.

Mr. GOODHUE wished to ask Mr. CLAIBORNE one question, "Whether he found himself growing rich?"

Mr. SEDGWICK saw no occasion for rising because the Committee were perfectly competent at this moment to determine the question.

Mr. RUTHERFORD was for reducing the salaries by one dollar per day, and one dollar every twenty-five miles that the members had to travel. This would be a reduction of one hundred dollars per day, which would be much better bestowed upon the innocent widow of the veteran who had fallen in the service of his country.

Mr. PAGE said, that he did not think the resolution as it was worded, was a proper subject for discussion in that place; for the House, and not a committee, could properly resolve that committees should be appointed. However, as the resolution had been submitted by the House to the consideration of the Committee of the Whole, it must be examined; but, as to the object of it, that he thought was more properly before the Committee, as proposed by the resolution; for, as I have remarked on other occasions, if, instead of discussing a question fully, and collecting the sense of all the members in a Committee of the Whole, it be referred to a committee of one member from each State, that committee might be unanimous in favor of a resolution, against which, eighteen members from Virginia, and a proportionate number from other States, might vote; or, by the weight of that committee, the resolution might be carried, which could not have passed had it been fully and freely discussed in the House. Here, then, my colleague's question should be examined, as I cannot say (as has been said by one of them) that I had no hand in fixing the salaries and pay of the officers of Government and members of Congress, having actually voted at New York for them as they now stand. I think I may with propriety, give my opinion respecting it. And I am clearly of opinion, sir, that the question arises from a misapprehension of the subject to which it is applied; for there cannot be a greater mistake than to suppose that parsimony in a Republic is necessary to its support. A certain degree of economy is so; but parsimony, applied to the salaries of public officers, and the Representatives in particular, may be ruinous to the interests of a Republic. Should the salaries be so low that men of small fortunes cannot afford to serve their country, it must be deprived of their assistance, and we must accept of the services of the rich, who, to have their wills, though low, will serve even without pay; or, the State will be served by artful demagogues, by ready, designing men, who may, in pursuit of profit as well as popularity, cut out places for themselves and friends, producing at length confusion and anarchy, or, at least, such a bungling system of legislation as will cost more time and money to rectify their blunders than the most extravagant salaries could amount to. What true Republican could wish to exclude from a seat in Congress a physician, lawyer, merchant, farmer, or any other person possessed of such well-known abilities and virtues as to attract the attention and respect of a district which might wish to intrust its interests to him as a Representative? Or, rather, who ought not to desire that, as all offices are open to all, that the son of the poorest citizen might be enabled, if qualified, to fill a seat here or elsewhere, to do it without sacrificing his private interest? Is it reasonable to expect that men should sacrifice domestic ease and the interests of their families to serve their country? It is not just to require it. Human nature, except on great and trying occasions, cannot obey such a requisition. My colleague says that he is not a man of fortune; but, has he not a profession by which he can make more than by his attendance on this House? If not, he has not a right to require such a sacrifice of any other person's time and talents. The Constitution, far from requiring any thing like it, demands that compensation shall be made for all services; and who will desire less for services than a mere subsistence for a person whilst actually employed in such service? I am sure that less than the present pay of members of Congress would not, in their present situation, be a subsistence. I recollect that, when the House of Representatives were debating, in the first session, at New York, whether their daily pay should be four, five, or six dollars, I affirmed that the expenses of the members where I boarded required that it should be six, that the State of Virginia having once allowed her Delegates to Congress eight dollars, and never less than six, when she bore the whole expense, could not object to her Representatives receiving that sum, when divided, as it was, amongst the States, and spread out over the various duties and taxes of the United States. I asked those, as I might ask my colleague now, who of our constituents could calculate what he would save by any proposed reduction of our pay? I have long suspected, sir, that Republics have lost more by parsimony than they were aware of, and that a misapprehension of some practices in ancient Republics has been artfully kept up, so as to favor Aristocracy and Monarchy. The British Parliament has now no pay; but have they been as independent as their countrymen wished them under the British Government?

The Upper House of the Legislature, which was also the Supreme Court and Privy Council, had a moderate salary, and would never consent to have it raised, that it might be no object to men of small fortunes. But we are told that there is discontent amongst some of our constituents respecting the high salaries of certain officers of Government, as well as of the members of Congress. I am sorry to hear it; but I hope that when they reconsider the subject of their complaint, they will find that it was founded on mistaken ideas of what is the real interest of a Government like this. I believe such a dissatisfaction is subsiding. I know that I was informed that some of my constituents had objected to my re-election on account of my votes at New York for high salaries; but I was re-elected by a great majority of votes in a district of ten counties, and have been again elected by a district composed of six other counties—that county in which I was born, and have always resided, being the only one which made a part of the former district of ten—and yet I have heard no complaints respecting our six dollars: on the contrary, I have been often told they were a moderate compensation. Had my constituents furnished me with instructions to vote for a reduction of it, I should have obeyed them. Had they sent by me remonstrances, such as my colleague says may be heaped upon your table, I should have laid them there; but I should never again ask them for a seat in the House. I should wish to retire.

In reply to the member who had objected to the pay of the SPEAKER, and the difference between the pay of members of the two Houses, Mr. P. said, that whoever would consider the duty of the SPEAKER; his long confinement to the Chair; his painful attention to every word spoken in the House, and his responsibility for the correctness of the Journals—an examination of which must take up much of his time—would surely not think his pay too great. As to the difference between the pay of a Senator and Representative, he had voted for it, from a belief that a Senator having more services to perform than a Representative, had a right to more pay. The Senate not only have to originate bills as this House has, and to revise and amend bills sent from hence, and often to correct the careless errors they contain, but to make themselves acquainted with the Law of Nations, and to be prepared to judge of Treaties; and also of offences brought before them by impeachments. When the Senators may have gone through the labors of a long session, and the Representatives are returning home, they may be called upon to consider certain nations to offices, or certain Treaties; and at another time to try certain impeachments. Besides all this, the age of a Senator must be such, by the Constitution, that it is probable that his family is larger, and his pursuits in life more fixed, and profitable than those of a Representative, who may be elected when only twenty-five, and therefore his services must require higher compensation. As to the President and Vice President's salaries, I voted for a larger sum than was allowed to either, and thought that the disproportion between them was too great. With respect to the judges, I still think their salaries too small, and so should every one think who will consider the vast importance of their office; the labor of both mind and body which it requires; the laborious course of study through which a man must have gone to be qualified for it, and the lucrative employment such an one must have given up to undertake it. In short, I do not repeat a salary which I think too high. And I must repeat it, that I do not think that large salaries in a Republic can injure it; but that small, inadequate salaries may overturn a Republic.

I am sorry that the question has been brought before us respecting our own pay this session, because the elections in Virginia are not over; it would become us much better another session, if re-elected, to reduce it, than to do so when we may be left out. Besides, if I vote for a reduction, I may be suspected of courting popularity; and, if against it, of despising the opinions of my constituents, if they have adopted those which some members tell us prevail amongst their constituents. I do not like to be in such a dilemma, nor to have my independence unnecessarily tried. I wish, as the question is before us, that it may be fully debated here, and even referred to the further consideration of a select committee; because I think the opinions even of a single member and his district should be treated with respect; and that when they have been fairly proved to be founded in error, there will be an end of complaints, and an acquiescence in the decision of this House.

Mr. GILLESPIE proposed an amendment, the scope of which was, that a committee should be appointed to examine and report whether any and what alterations were necessary in the act fixing salaries to the officers under Government. He suggested this amendment from no motive whatever but what was fair. There had been, and there still was, a degree of clamor upon the subject, and it was the duty of the House to pay attention to the voice of the public, whether right or wrong. If, upon investigation, it should appear that the salaries were not higher than they ought to be, then the report of the Committee would be the best method for stopping the public clamor.

Reduction of Salaries.

Mr. CLAIRBORNE hoped that the Committee would not rise, but decide the point. He trusted that no gentleman would again point at him, and say that the motion came out of his brain. There was not one officer under Government whom he would point out and say, that such an officer had too high a salary. He had expectations that this discussion, by bringing forward the observations of several gentlemen, would in some degree satisfy the people, and that there would be no more pointing out with a finger and saying, "There goes a six dollars-a-day man."

Another member observed, that it was the duty of the House to attend to the voice of their constituents, and for this reason, he should vote for a Committee. He would mention what he had always considered as a most odious distinction, the additional dollar per day, which is to be paid to the Senate from and after the 4th of March next. [The reader will observe, that by the act, members of the Senate were to have seven dollars per day, but the additional dollar was not to commence till the lapse of six years, when all the Senators of the first Congress had gone out.] There was another thing for which he never could see any reason, and that was the giving of twelve dollars per day to the SPEAKER.

Mr. GILES was perfectly convinced that the allowance to the members is small enough already. The saving of a dollar per day suggested by Mr. RUTHERFORD, would be but little, and it was beginning at the worst of resources. The pay ought to be such as would bring persons of middling circumstances into the House; persons neither too high in life nor too low. If the pay was greatly reduced, none but very rich people could afford to give their attendance, and if too high, a seat in the House might be an object to persons of an opposite description. Formerly the State of Virginia allowed eight dollars per day to the members of its Legislature. This sum had since been reduced to six dollars. Mr. G. mentioned this to show that in the practice of individual States, there might be found a precedent for the allowance to members of Congress. He was for voting directly. Mr. G. said, that there was a country from which America had copied a great deal, and very often too much; a country which still had a very pernicious influence in the United States. The members of the British House of Commons received no wages, while the officers of State had immense salaries. It was, however, understood, that the British House of Commons were very well paid for the trouble of their attendance. Mr. G. did not wish to see scenes of that kind in this country.

Mr. HILLHOUSE hoped that the House would have done with this thing immediately, as it had now answered all the purposes expected from it, and he trusted that all motions of that sort which had an eye to certain operations out of the House, would meet with the same fate.

The motion was negatived by a very great majority.

[Before the adjournment, the SPEAKER suggested to the House a considerable inconvenience, occasioned by gentlemen being introduced, and occupying such parts of the House without the bar as were particularly allotted for the use of the House, and of which several members complained. There was often so great a crowd that members could scarce walk round when they had papers to present to the Chair. The passage was often obstructed when messages were to be delivered, and frequently there was no room left for the members when they wished to confer privately with each other. As he did not conceive himself authorized to give special directions without orders from the House, he would take the liberty to suggest to the members of the House, when introducing their friends, the propriety of placing them under the galleries to the left of the Chair, and reserving the space to the right of the Chair for the members of both branches of the Legislature, the diplomatic gentlemen, judges, and other officers of Government; which was generally acquiesced in.]

WEDNESDAY, January 28.

A petition of sundry iron masters, in the State of Pennsylvania, whose names are thereunto subscribed, was presented to the House and read, praying that an additional duty may be imposed on all iron imported from foreign countries; or that such other encouragement may be given to the manufacturing the said article within the United States, as to the wisdom of Congress shall seem meet. Laid on the table.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill to repeal a part, and to continue in force another part, of the act, entitled "An act prohibiting, for a limited time, the exportation of arms and ammunition, and encouraging the importation of the same;" and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose, and reported the bill without amendment.

Ordered, That the said bill be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the report of the committee to whom was referred that part of the Message from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, of the eighth instant, which relates to the Letter from the Governor of the Territory Northwest of the river Ohio; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose, and reported the following resolution, which was twice read, and agreed to, viz:

Resolved, That an appellate jurisdiction of all causes whereof one Judge of the Supreme Judicial Court of the Territory Northwest of the river

Ohio, now has jurisdiction, ought to be given to the two Judges of the same Court, who may not have adjudicated on the first trial, and the Governor of the Territory; any two of whom to form a Court for that purpose: and also, that, in cases of greater amount than five hundred dollars, an appeal ought to be given to the Supreme Judicial Court of the United States.

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in pursuant to the said resolution, and that Mr. DEXTER, Mr. HARTLEY, and Mr. HARRISON, do prepare and bring in the same.

Mr. SAMUEL SMITH, from the committee to whom was re-committed the report of the committee on the report of the Secretary of War, respecting the fortifications of the United States, made a report; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

THOMAS PERSON AND OTHERS.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the report of the select committee on the Message of the President, with a Letter from the Governor of North Carolina, enclosing the memorial of Thomas Person, and others, proprietors of land Southwest of the Ohio.

This report produced a long debate. It was contended that the Government of the United States ought to indemnify the purchasers of certain lands in North Carolina, who had purchased them, under the sanction of the State, from the Indians. The Government had given up the land to the Indians.

Mr. McDOWELL said, that the right of the Government for what they had done, might justly be called in question. He called upon the Legislature, in behalf of the people, either to give them sure possession of their lands or to give them some equivalent. He asked this as a matter of right, and not as a favor. Mr. McD. never had been, nor was now, a willing interested in the concern, but knowing, as he did, that a very great number of citizens were injured by this act of Government, he thought that it was just and right to compensate them in some way, or at least each of them as are willing to relinquish their claims. There were many in easy circumstances, no doubt, who would not be willing to give up their claims; but, on the other hand, many by their situation would be obliged to do it.

Several other gentlemen spoke, at length.

Mr. GILLESPIE moved that the Committee should rise, and the Chairman ask leave to sit again.

Mr. SPODWINX was for the vote being taken immediately.

Mr. MACON said that he had not before seen such conduct. It was plainly saying that we make no answer to your arguments, but call for the question, and outvote you. It was not consulting the dignity of the House.

Mr. SPODWINX did not know which way the votes would go, as he had not spoken to any gentleman upon the subject. This question had been very fully discussed, and listened to with great patience by the members.

At last the Committee rose; the Chairman reported progress, and leave was granted to sit again.

THURSDAY, January 29.

AARON KIRCHELL, returned to serve in this House, as a member for the State of New Jersey, in the room of Abraham Clark, deceased, appeared, produced his credentials, and took his seat in the House; the oath to support the Constitution of the United States being first administered to him, by Mr. SPEAKER, according to law.

An engrossed bill to repeal a part, and to continue in force another part, of the act, entitled "An act prohibiting, for a limited time, the exportation of arms and ammunition, and encouraging the importation of the same," was read the third time and passed.

A representation of the Legislature of South Carolina was laid before the House and read, suggesting the propriety of an amendment to the Militia laws of the United States, relative to the rank of officers in the cavalry and artillery, as well as of those in the lines of the different States generally.

Ordered, That the said representation be referred to the committee appointed to prepare and bring in a bill or bills respecting the organizing, arming, and disciplining the Militia of the United States.

Mr. WILLIAM SMITH, from the committee appointed, presented a bill authorizing the erection of a light-house near the entrance of Georgetown harbor, in the State of South Carolina: which was read twice and committed.

The House proceeded to consider the report of the committee to whom was referred the memorial of Joze Roiz Silva, which lay upon the table: Whereupon,

Resolved, That the Collector of the District of New York be authorized to receive the invoice and other profits of Joze Roiz Silva, respecting the cargoes of wines mentioned in his memorial, and if he shall be satisfied that the same, or any part thereof, was subject to a less duty than that charged and paid, then to refund to the said Joze Roiz Silva such sum, if any, as shall appear to be overcharged on the said cargo.

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in, pursuant to the said resolution, and that Mr. WATTS, Mr. CORFAX, and Mr. MALBOSSE, do prepare and bring in the same.

Mr. BALDWIN, from the committee to whom was re-committed the report of the committee appointed to report what further provisions are necessary for the more general promulgation of the laws, made a report; which was read, and ordered to be committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday next.

THOMAS PERSON AND OTHERS.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, Mr. COBB in the Chair, to resume the consideration of the claims of Thomas Person and others, to certain lands lying on the frontier of the State of North Carolina, and ceded by the Commissioners of the United States to the Indians.

Mr. GILLESPIE took up the subject in the same stage in which it stood before he spoke the preceding day. He said, let us examine the conduct of other States. Did not New York dispose of lands within her chartered limits, and from the sales become wealthy, as she has large sums in the funds? The State of Virginia took advantage of the purchase of Henderson and Company, for that part now called Kentucky, although they now exclaim that the purchase was unlawful; yet, unlawful as it was, it has extinguished the Indian title to those lands. Now, if the purchase of Henderson and Company had this effect on the Northeast side of Walker's line, which divides Kentucky from the Southwest Territory, is it not just that it should have the same effect on the Southwest side, when made by the same persons, on the self-same day? And surely the rights of North Carolina must be at least equal to that of Kentucky, in everything except that of power. But is Congress going to legislate by strength of arm? I hope not. It has been admitted, by some who have spoken on the subject, that the citizens of North Carolina have a right of redress by law, and by others, against her own Legislature. To the first of these, I ask, against whom is the suit to commence? Are our citizens, thus bereft of their property, to be compelled to litigate suits at law for property taken for public use, and for which they have a just claim against the United States; or have they not an equal right to compensation for that which the United States, by their agent, took from them, as other citizens are entitled to, for property piratically taken on the high seas, by the robbers of Britain? And do we, in the last case, say to these unfortunate sufferers, commence suits against those who have injured you? No. Government has taken the litigation in hand, at her own cost. Let her do so with the citizens of North Carolina. Or, will the Government of the United States support the claim of the injured against her own Executive? Will they do it against the State of North Carolina? They cannot; and from what has been said in this matter it is plain that, as the Government of the United States has converted the property of the citizens of North Carolina to the uses of her Government, compensation ought to be made out of the public purse, as the contrary would, on her part, destroy that bond of union between her as the sovereign power of the United States, and her citizens, and as not only bound to govern with justice, but also to protect them from all manner of injury, as well domestic as foreign. Mr. G. apologized, that he was without authority in the House, but would pledge his reputation that what he should advance, if not verbatim, should be in substance with the author quoted:

"It is admitted by many, that the sovereign authority possesses a power, under the laws of ancient domain, to alienate the property of the subject, for the benefit of the Commonwealth, by impending public necessity against private injury." But, without doubt, they "that have lost or sacrificed their property to the public safety in such extremity, ought to have satisfaction made, as far as possible, by the Commonwealth. Anything short of this would destroy the reciprocity between the sovereign and subject."—Puffendorf, b. 8, c. 5, § 7.

But can public necessity be urged in the present case to justify this kind of political robbery? I answer, no. If the Indians are to be kept in peace by bribes, why not in this, as in other similar cases, by presents and pecuniary rewards? Is it not an indignity to the United States to purchase peace from an Indian nation, at the expense of a part of her citizens, whose resources at best were scanty, and are, by this and other speculations, almost annihilated? Surely it is. And let me add, is it not an invariable axiom with all authors on Government,

"That all sacrifices of property made by individuals for the public benefit or accommodation, should or ought to be paid out of the public revenue, and that one should not bear more of the burden than another."—Burlemaqui, b. 8, c. 5, § 27, 28.

Is it not, then, obvious to all, who will reflect on this subject, that compensation is due to these individuals, whose property has been wrested from them for Government purposes? The same author observes, in the 38th section of the same chapter:

"That as no subject can assume any part of the sovereign power without the consent of the whole, neither can any sovereign authority deprive the subject of his right and property, nor substitute another sovereign over him without his consent."

The public is in nothing more essentially interested than in the protection of every individual's private rights, as modelled by the municipal law in this and similar cases. The Legislature can and frequently does interpose, and compel the individual to acquiesce. But how does it interpose and compel? Not by stripping the individual of his property in an arbitrary manner. No. But by giving him full and ample indemnification for the injury sustained; for there must be an end of all social commerce between man and man, unless private possessions be secured from unjust invasions. Thus, the protection of a State, in every precedent to be found in books that treat of the fundamental laws of civil society, or in the resolutions and acts of the British Parliament, means restitution, indemnity, or compensation. Grotius, when treating of the right of the sovereign authority to give up or take the property of the subject, calls it a "restitution, satisfaction." Burlemaqui, "indemnity, and indemnifying the subject for the injury sustained;" and Vattel, "recompense out of the public money." It is further observed, that cases of this kind operate, like property thrown into the sea to save the ship, by making an estimate of the loss, and causing an equal average on the property saved, which each owner is bound to pay. So that, from the fullest conviction, I am of opinion the citizens of North Carolina are entitled to the relief reported by the select committee, and that strict justice requires we should comply with it; for, as I have said, in nothing is the Government of the United States more concerned in a superlative degree, than in doing strict justice to her citizens, as of the last importance in preserving the affections of the people to the Government. Vacancies in our Departments, civil, judicial, or military, may be supplied as well, but to restore the confidence of a people borne down with oppression, exceeds comprehension. It is like attempting to return from the grave—is without precedent, and is vain labor indeed. At different epochs it has shook the foundations of monarchies, and caused tyrants to tremble and atone for their crimes with their lives; and, as I said at an early stage of the debate, if usurpers, tyrants, and despots, have been compelled to do justice, by this undeniable law of nature, shall the Government of the United States, founded on the pure principles of Democracy, be less just? Surely not. Have we received a power to exercise in wantonly oppressing those who gave it? God forbid! Therefore, let it ever be impressed on our minds, that justice exalts a nation. The House, I hope, will pardon my detaining them, at a time when every moment is precious. But the duty I owe to my injured constituents forbids silence, and will I hope be a sufficient apology. I shall therefore, submit to the judgment of the House, not doubting but justice will be done.

Mr. NICHOLAS was satisfied that the purchasers of the lands had a claim either against the United States or the State of North Carolina. Much had been said about the Indian right; but the Indians never had been fit to occupy these lands. It could never have been the design of nature that these people should be termed the possessors of land which they were incapable to enjoy. He was, upon the whole, on the side of the claimants, though he enumerated some of the difficulties that would attend an attempt to please all parties.

Mr. W. SMITH had found much difficulty in forming his opinion upon this question. He had at first been somewhat disposed against the claimants, but at last, after full deliberation, he was convinced of the justice of giving them redress. He requested the particular attention and candor of the House. The United States were, in this case, made a judge in their own cause, and therefore it became more their duty to examine every part of the subject with the more accuracy. Mr. S. then began a distinct detail of the circumstances in the present dispute. Previous to the year 1776, North Carolina was a British Colony, and the British Crown considered itself as entitled to bestow grants of territory. In that year, North Carolina became a sovereign State, and consequently she conceived herself as succeeding to the right of the British Crown, and as having a right to bestow grants in the same way as the Kings of Great Britain had done. This claim was asserted in her general Declaration of Rights, and it was incorporated into her Constitution. When North Carolina entered into the Union, all the Legislative rights of the State were preserved, and, by a necessary inference, her title to the lands comprehended in her original charter. In 1783, the State opened an office to sell the absolute right of such lands as had not been disposed of. In 1789, North Carolina ceded the right of jurisdiction to the United States, but she reserved her own Legislative rights, and consequently her right to sell the lands within her own territory; and in disposing of the lands in question, the State did not intend merely to sell the right of pre-emption from the Indians, but the absolute title to the lands. Mr. S. read a part of the Constitution of North Carolina, in order to explain what degree of legislation the State had conceded to the Federal Government, and what part she had reserved to herself; and he was clearly of opinion, that the disposal of the lands had been reserved. In 1783, the State offered these lands for sale. In 1786, the Commissioners of the United States assigned a great part of them to the Indians. In 1788, the Legislature of North Carolina declared that they would support the purchasers. The grand question now is, did the State, by according to the Confederation, give up her right of legislation? She gave up her right to make Indian treaties, but reserved that of legislation, because, as above observed, it formed a part of her Constitution, which was understood to continue unviolated. These lands were bought with certificates, which it was alleged, on the other side, would purchase nothing else. If the certificates would purchase nothing else, it was proper at least that they should have been restored to their first owners, who might have subscribed them to a part of the Public Debt of the United States. They were certainly entitled either to their land or their certificates. These certificates, which were paid into the Treasury of North Carolina, were those of the United States. If the owners had only a pre-emption right, Mr. S. insisted that the certificates should be returned.

Mr. SEDGWICK said, that this was quite a new fact to him, and if it was as stated, there was no necessity for Legislative interference at all. The State of North Carolina had only to come forward and subscribe them to the Treasury.

Mr. W. SMITH explained, that when delivered into the Treasury of North Carolina, they had been cancelled. After this they were again ordered to be made current by the subscriptions of the officers of the State, and in that shape they were offered to the Commissioners of Loans, who refused to accept them. The exact amount of the certificates could still be ascertained, as well as the names of the persons to whom they belonged. They had been cancelled, but not destroyed.

Mr. BOUNDINOT imagined that Mr. SMITH had furnished a new and forcible argument against his own cause. This claim of North Carolina to sell the lands was wrong, and this doctrine had been the cause of all the disputes in which the Federal Government has been engaged. The Crown of Britain had never pretended to any right of this kind, nor ever thought it had a title to any lands till they were first purchased from the Indians. The question before the Committee was, have the United States taken away any claim which the purchasers of these lands had? And the answer is, that the United States have not. The State of North Carolina only had a right to sell the privilege of pre-emption. This was the only right which the purchasers obtained, and this right they still possess. As to the certificates, they were not those of the United States, but those of North Carolina. They were not Continental certificates, and for that reason Continental officers would not accept them; but North Carolina has since brought these certificates into her account against the General Government. The Commissioners, in 1786, had done a very great service to North Carolina, by settling a line of boundary, and putting an end to the Indian war. He thought that the best way would be for the claimants to apply to the Executive, and agree among themselves to extinguish, by an interference of that kind, the Indian right. This would be much better than for the House to involve itself in the purchase of an immense tract of land, at an expense of seven or eight hundred thousand dollars, (or how much more Mr. B. could not tell,) when there was so much occasion for the money to pay the National Debt. He again declared that he should think it the best way to obtain the good offices of the Executive in extinguishing the Indian right. The Six Nations possessed part of the territory of Pennsylvania. This State also may apply to the General Government for redress, if North Carolina were to get payment for these lands. The State of New York may do so, for the same reasons as North Carolina. This would be involving the Government in an endless labyrinth. He was as unwilling as any gentleman in the House to interfere with the rights of the Legislature of North Carolina. But he did not wish to see the House going blindfold into the business. The United States have too much land already.

Mr. KITTERA.—The certificates must have been given in by North Carolina to the United States. She denied the right of the Commissioners, in 1786, to make Indian treaties, but now that right is given up. He agreed with Mr. BOUNDINOT as to his observations on Pennsylvania. Georgia, also, he said, had about sixty millions of acres within her chartered limits. The business would never have ended, if the General Government was to interfere in all these cases.

Mr. SCOTT.—Has not this Government a right to restrain every wild-goose excursion into the woods? If it has not, the Union must fall prostrate at the feet of every wild speculator. Pennsylvania, at a great expense, made preparations for an establishment at Presque Isle. The ground had been bought at a great expense from the United States. Yet for the sake of general peace, the settlement had been stopped.

Mr. McDOWELL denied that the two cases corresponded, for the lands at Presque Isle had not been given to the Six Nations.

Mr. BOUNDINOT differed from the last speaker. He did not think that anything farther had been done against the interest of North Carolina than against that of Pennsylvania.

Mr. BOUNDINOT denied that the Indians ever occupied the lands in question, or were fit to occupy them in any proper sense of the word. To walk across a country, and to shoot in it, was different from an occupation. But, besides, the Creeks and Cherokees were not the only tribes who had hunted there. It had been said yesterday that these lands gave rise to speculation. Mr. B. wished that it had done so, for in that case the certificates would all have been paid by this time. There was no difficulty in funding Southern certificates, when once they got into the hands of Northern speculators. Mr. B. thought himself entitled to receive back from the United States the money which he had paid into the Treasury of North Carolina for these lands.

Mr. MURRAY requested the favor of any gentleman to inform him, whether the lands in question were possessed and occupied, in the more civilized sense of the terms, by the white people? He believed they were not. Had they been in peaceable possession, living on, and cultivating the lands, that circumstance would form a very interesting motive in his mind in favor of the indemnity that was asked. But, in fact, they never were possessed of any right but that which North Carolina could give them—the pre-emption right; that right they now possessed as fully as they did at the time of the cession to the United States. [Mr. CARRES rose, and informed him, that many white people, who had begun farms, were driven off their lands, and reduced to great distress by the proceedings of the Commissioners.] Mr. M. said, an argument struck him of some weight—that if the claim be gratified, the claimants will be in a better situation now than they would have been if the cession had not been made; for North Carolina could not have given them absolute possession but by force of arms. This she would not have a right to do, under this Confederation, nor under the Constitution, as no one State can make war. But the claimants can ask nothing more of the United States than they could have had accomplished for them by the State of North Carolina. A new doctrine resulting from the Revolution, must be admitted as a ground of reasoning, when Indian, unconquered territory, is before us. The Provinces had power, as individual bodies—which States, as such, have not—the right of making war, and gaining possession of Indian territory by conquest. So it was, that a Province could, from its own separate resources, make war on Indians, and pay individually the expense. But when the great contest for Independence came on, all the States were, in fact, principal confederated bodies, long before they signed the paper of Confederation. The doctrine, which suited such a body of States, was, that whatever might be gained by the joint efforts and expense of all, should be the property of all, jointly; and he thought that every principle of sound justice warranted him in applying the doctrine, so far as to say, that whatever might be the chartered limits of each Province, while dependent, yet the moment of the joint contest was that in which the true limits of a State were, as far as property in land went, confined to that boundary which was really located, occupied, and peaceably holden within the limits. To say that the State had a right more positive than the pre-emptive one, to lands actually occupied and defended by hostile tribes of Indians within the chartered limits, admits a principle, that, if put into action, tended necessarily to violate the great principle of the Confederation, and of the present Constitution, which divests the individual States of the right to make war; as the State, to make good any sales she might make within the hostile territory, would be obliged to make war on the tribes to dispossess them. The lands in question were in this situation. They were occupied by Indian tribes, and were never in possession of North Carolina. The gentleman from that State seems to doubt the occupancy of the tribes. Mr. M. believed we would violate principles of justice were we to borrow the principle of occupancy from books, and apply it to Indian society. The Indian tribes held certain tracts of land. As to the mode in which they thought it most rational to use the land, it was nothing against their right to say its exercise differed from our mode. He understood they made a hunting ground of the land in dispute. They had a right to use it as such, and their mode of use was no argument against their right. All that could be, or was proved to belong to North Carolina, was the Colonial right of qualified sovereignty, called the pre-emption right. This was all she could grant, and this was all that the claimants could take from her. They had that now; and as he could not see the propriety of making their situation better than if the cession had not been made, so he could not agree to the resolution for giving them indemnity. Perhaps his ideas on the subject might be fashioned by local circumstances, belonging as he did to a State which had no share in those rich funds which the large frontier States possessed, he thought, very unjustly, in immense tracts of back lands. He felt it a duty to narrow all claims like the present as much as possible. Connecticut, Rhode Island, Jersey, Delaware, Maryland, were all in the same situation. They had no back lands, and were divested of the share they were justly entitled to in the back lands, which now bring immense funds of wealth into the land offices of those States which possess them.

Mr. HENRICKS wished to have that part of the law read which relates to the species of certificates referred to in the debate; this was accordingly done. Mr. H. said that he had not enough of evidence before him to give a vote. He therefore wished that the Committee might rise.

Mr. MACON said, that, according to Mr. BOURNOR, it was the doctrine of North Carolina in 1783, that the State possessed a right to the unappropriated lands. If that was their doctrine then, nothing had since happened which could make it cease to be so now. The Crown of Britain had transferred the absolute property of lands without inquiring for permission from the Indians. This evidence went strongly to prove that North Carolina had the same title. The case of Presqu' Isle did not apply, for Pennsylvania was raising troops to make that settlement, and no State can, by the Constitution, raise troops of itself. He wished the Committee not to rise till they had determined the question.

Mr. CANAN had foreseen that the claim before the Committee would be opposed upon various grounds; but he considered none of them as well founded. Grants were first made by North Carolina to individuals, of lands within her chartered boundary. The cession made to and accepted by the United States, conditioned to secure the interest of individuals. A treaty was thereafter ordered to be held by the United States with the Indians, and by that treaty, lands formerly granted, were relinquished to them. The Commissioners of North Carolina protested in form. The people turned out, had paid ten pounds the hundred acres, for their lands, and they were entitled to compensation from North Carolina, or from the United States. It had been said, that North Carolina had no right but that of pre-emption. This Mr. C. denied. North Carolina had a right to all the lands within her boundary; and there was an express agreement reserving those lands to individuals. Why did the United States contract with the State, if she had no right? The Indians never could have been considered an independent nation, else there would be compensation in imperio. He mentioned the case of the Tallissee Country containing four millions of acres. By a treaty made in 1785, between the State of Georgia and the Creeks, this land was ceded to Georgia. By a second treaty, at New York, this very country was relinquished to the Indians, and of course the bona fide right of the State wrested from them. If a decision could be had on this case before a judicial tribunal, it would not require a moment's hesitation to determine in favor of the State, and that the treaty was a nullity. It had been alleged that the right of pre-emption was the only right in possession of the States, that is, a title to purchase of the holders of the property, in exclusion of all other States, or individuals thereof or the particular State. Mr. C. contended that the fee-simple of all the soil within the chartered limits belonged to the State. As to the boundaries, the definitive Treaty of Peace settles them beyond contradiction. As to the proprietors of these lands being in no worse condition now than before the cession back to the Indians, the people were plowing the lands, when driven from them, and will any gentleman say that this is not injuring people? As to the State of North Carolina having no particular claim to the land now beyond the Indian line, he would put a case within the chapter of possibilities. Suppose that all the Indians were driven over the Mississippi to-morrow, to whom would the lands which they now possess belong? The particular States, to be sure, within whose range they lay. The gentlemen who advocate for humanity, and who talk of treating the Indians with humanity, are the very men who have uniformly countenanced the raising of troops, and augmenting the force on our Northwestern frontiers. How can they reconcile their conduct? The Indians to the South are to be treated with humanity, and those to the North are to be butchered, that the United States may enjoy their property.

Mr. BOURNOR said, that the charter from Britain extended to the South Sea, but such a stretch of territory was not really claimed by Britain

He read several of the old laws of North Carolina, to prove that the Indian right of soil had always been acknowledged.

Mr. BOURNOR had never thought of quoting this book, which he now did, to show that the British Government had authorized conquest. He did not know of one purchase made in Carolina. It was all conquest, and so were nine-tenths of all the lands held by the white people in America.

Mr. McDOWELL.—Those lands which are the subject of debate, and which a number of gentlemen have contended that North Carolina had not a right to grant to her citizens, have been proved to be within the chartered limits as granted by Charles II., and which limits, sovereignty and jurisdiction were guaranteed to the State by the Articles of Confederation.

After this, and within the year 1783, the Legislature passed a law for opening an office to receive entries of lands in the district of country now called the Territory South of the Ohio, for the redemption of special and other certificates; and after a number of the surveys were made, and the grants issued, the Government of the United States ordered a treaty to be held with the Cherokee Indians at Holston, in the year 1785, and the Commissioners agreed to give up a large quantity of lands before stated to the Indians; but, previous to articles being signed, Colonel Blount, who was the agent for North Carolina, entered his protest in behalf of the State, that some of the articles about to be entered into between the Commissioners, on the part of the United States, and the Cherokee Indians, would infringe on the Legislative rights of the State of North Carolina, and the Legislature of the State also protested against the proceedings.

I must here remark, that the then Government of the United States, agreeably to the Articles of Confederation, could not legally make use of the property of the State for any purpose without their consent.

This continued to be the situation of this business, till after Congress requested a cession of those lands, with the sovereignty thereof, which now form the Territory South of the Ohio, which was complied with, under certain reservations, to continue claims, and the situations of the claimants as good as though this cession had not been made, which was a complete acknowledgment of the right of North Carolina, on the part of the United States, but in my opinion placed them in the same situation that the State would have been in, had the cession not taken place.

Since the adoption of the present Government, another treaty was ordered to be held with the Indians, and the lands were given up to the Indians. Here the Executive right to make such treaty may be questioned, and I believe rightly too; for it would be an extraordinary power for them to make use of the property of individuals, without their consent, or making any compensation, and apply it to national purposes. Great difficulties would be involved, were a remedy to be attempted in a judicial way against the Government. I do therefore think either that policy or interest, on the part of the United States, would point out a compliance, in part, with the report on the table, for it will not place the United States in any worse situation than they would have been in, had the lands not been entered. Had that been the case, those certificates would have been in the hands of individuals, a debt against the Government, but on their being subscribed now, to the amount actually paid on their relinquishing their claim, you would then have the land, which will be valuable at a period far distant.

Some gentlemen appear to be alarmed at the sum; but if the principle is a just or fair one, the sum ought not to be an objection. I will here state further, to remove the alarms of those gentlemen, that the sum will fall far short of the statement made by Mr. Jefferson, as a great deduction is to be taken from that; but I can further assert, that a great number of the claimants would not relinquish their claim to said lands to subscribe; it would generally be such as are in indigent circumstances. And here I cannot help making some reply to the objections stated by several members, who have alleged that North Carolina had acted wrong in selling these lands before they had extinguished the Indian claim, and that the claimants were in no worse situation than they would have been had the cession not have taken place. I am not a little surprised to find, that gentlemen cannot see the distinction, for had the cession and treaty at Holston taken place, they were at liberty to settle the lands, and North Carolina was bound to protect them; but since the treaty had been made, the land is not only given up as stated, but it is made criminal to cross the boundary. Mr. DEXTER has stated that North Carolina has acted unjustly and wrong in making sale of those lands before she had extinguished the Indian claims.

Here I shall repeat what I stated before in answer to what the gentleman has said. That the Indian claims to said lands were, in part, extinguished by Henderson's purchase, and part by conquest, and that a considerable part of the lands, that no nation of Indians could establish a claim to, had been claimed by different tribes as territory grounds, but had not been inhabited by any tribe within the memory, or any account that can be traced, and for as great a length of time the different tribes had been at war with each other about the right of hunting on said land. But so far as it relates to the right of North Carolina, I believe no member has a right to call it in question at this time. The gentleman's arguments would have been more applicable at the time the cession act was under consideration; and as to what the member said about the principle and precedent it would fix, I will only call the attention of that gentleman and the Committee, to the conduct of the Government of the United States. Have they not pushed conquests into the Indian country Northwest of the Ohio? Are they not continuing to do so, and is it not in contemplation to sell large quantities of lands in that country, that have never been purchased? If so, the precedent which the gentleman fears so much is already established. But here I beg leave to call the at-tion of the Committee, in the most serious manner, to the number of citizens concerned, perhaps near twenty thousand. A great number of them are men who turned out in support of the American Independence, who fought, who bled, and furnished their property freely to the support of the cause. For this service they received certificates, which they wished to realize by entering said lands, and flattered themselves with sitting down on those lands, and in the latter part of life, making themselves and families happy. Their hopes were soon blasted. After the act of last session, the Treaty of Holston took place, which gave their property to a savage and cruel enemy, to quiet the minds of an enemy who not only were opposed to us through the war with Britain, but ever since have been imbruing their hands in the blood of innocent women and children. What will be the feelings of the claimants, who have acted as I have stated, when they find that their request, which to be sure is a modest one, and which is only to be reimbursed for sums actually paid, is refused. Should this be the decision, I leave you to draw the conclusion. Should they proceed to settle those lands in opposition to the treaty, I should not be much surprised. But the report on your table goes too far, as to damage and a future preference, which I am not in favor of; therefore the resolutions in the latter part of the report I hope will be stricken out.

On the same question, Mr. GILLESPIE made the subsequent remarks: he observed a disposition in the House to call the question; he then said that the situation in which he stood required that he should say something in support of the resolution under consideration, as it had been stated as a new and singular case, from which he took the liberty to dissent, as every writer on the law and usage of nations, held it as an invariable axiom, that all sacrifices of property made by individuals for public uses, ought to be paid out of the public purse. He stated the Treaty between England, France, and Spain, in 1763, and the case of the loyalists in 1783, and as the hour of adjournment had arrived, concluded with a motion for the Committee to rise, and report progress.

The question was then put. Shall the Committee now rise and report progress? This was negatived. The resolutions in the report were successively put, and lost.

The Committee then rose; the Chairman reported progress, and the House adjourned.

FRIDAY, January 30.

A memorial of sundry manufacturers of hemp, in the town of Newport, in the State of Rhode Island, whose names are thereunto subscribed, was presented to the House and read, praying that a drawback of the duty imposed by law on the importation of foreign hemp, may be allowed on the exportation of the same, when manufactured into cordage within the United States. Also, A memorial of sundry manufacturers of chocolate, in the State of Massachusetts, praying that so much of an act passed at the last session of Congress, as imposes an additional duty of two cents per pound on cocoa imported from foreign countries, may be repealed; and that such measures may be adopted for encouraging the manufacture of the said article within the United States, as to the wisdom of Congress shall seem meet.

Ordered, That the said memorials be referred to Mr. GOODRICH, Mr. WARREN, and Mr. HEISTER; that they do examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their opinions thereon, to the House.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, stating "that, pursuant to the duty enjoined by law upon the Head of that Department, he has prepared a report, containing some suggestions for the improvement and better management of the several branches of the actual revenues of the United States, which is ready to be communicated, as the House may be pleased to direct." The letter was read: Whereupon,

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be informed that the House is ready to receive the report therein referred to.

The House proceeded to consider the report of the committee to whom was referred the Message from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, of the thirtieth of January, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-four, enclosing the copy of a letter from the Governor of North Carolina, covering a resolution of the Legislature of that State; as also, the petitions of Thomas Person and others, proprietors of lands in the Territory of the United States South of the river Ohio, and of the Trustees of the University of North Carolina, to which the Committee of the Whole House had, yesterday, reported their disagreement: Whereupon,

The first resolution reported by the committee, being again read, in the words following, to wit:

"Resolved, That it shall be lawful for the Executive of the State of North Carolina to subscribe, by way of loan to the United States, the amount of all such certificates as have been deposited in payment for any lands (reserved by the act of cession aforesaid) in payment for any lands which may have been relinquished to the Indians by the treaty aforesaid, in trust for the persons by whom they were so deposited, according to their respective rights and interests."

The question was taken, that the House do agree with the Committee of the Whole House in their disagreement to the said first resolution, and it was resolved in the affirmative.

The second resolution reported by the committee, being again read, in the words following, to wit:

"Resolved, That the United States ought to reimburse the said persons the money which they have expended in having entries and surveys made, and in obtaining grants, and any other incidental charges which they have necessarily incurred, with interest; and that they should moreover make a reasonable allowance for the loss and damage which the petitioners have sustained, by having possession of the said land withheld from them."

The question was taken, that the House do agree with the Committee of the Whole House in their disagreement to the said second resolution, and resolved in the affirmative.

The third resolution reported by the committee, being again read, in the words following, to wit:

"And whereas the grants to the aforesaid lands, made by virtue of an act of the Legislature of North Carolina are valid to all intents and purposes, as coming fully within the purview of a condition contained in the act of cession from the said State to the United States: Therefore,

Resolved, That, whenever the United States shall think proper to extinguish the Indian claim to the said lands, by purchase or otherwise, it will be just and reasonable that the several persons who have obtained grants, or made surveys or entries, should have such rights confirmed and established, and their titles perfected, in preference to any other persons, on repaying to the Treasury of the United States, the amount of what they may now receive, as a compensation for their disbursements and losses, in case such persons shall think proper to make such repayment within a certain time, to be limited by Congress for that purpose."

The question was taken, that the House do agree with the Committee of the Whole House, in their disagreement to the said third resolution, and resolved in the affirmative.

A motion was then made, and the question being put, that the House do agree to the following resolution:

"Resolved, That such persons as have entered lands agreeably to the laws of North Carolina, in the Territory ceded by that State to the United States, and on the Indian side of the line established by the Treaty of Holston, ought to be reimbursed by the United States the amount of the purchase-money actually paid for the same, and the necessary expense of locating and surveying; where the survey has been made; such persons first relinquishing their right thereto, to the United States."

It passed in the negative, yeas 14, nays 56—as follows:

YEA.—Theodoros Bailey, Thomas Blount, William B. Grove, George Hancock, Matthew Locke, Nathaniel Macoun, Joseph McDowell, Alexander Mebane, John Page, Robert Rutherford, William Smith, Benjamin Williams, Richard Winn, and Joseph Winston.

NAY.—Fisher Ames, John Beatty, Elias Boudinot, Shearjashub Bourne, Benjamin Bourne, Lambert Cadwalader, Thomas Claiborne, David Cobb, Peleg Coffin, Joshua Coit, Jonathan Dayton, Henry Dearborn, George Dent, Gabriel Duvall, Benjamin Edwards, Thomas Fitzsimons, Dwight Foster, Ezekiel Gilbert, Nicholas Gilman, Henry Glenn, Benjamin Goodhue, Andrew Gregg, Thomas Hartley, John Heath, James Hillhouse, William Hindman, Samuel Holten, John Hunter, William Irvine, Aaron Kitchell, Amasa Learned, William Lyman, James Madison, William Montgomerie, Andrew Moore, Peter Muhlenberg, William Vans Murray, Anthony New, John Nicholas, Nathaniel Niles, Alexander D. Orr, Josiah Parker, Andrew Pickens, Francis Preston, Thomas Scott, John S. Sherburne, Jeremiah Smith, Samuel Smith, Zephaniah Swift, George Thatcher, Uriah Tracy, Jonathan Trumbull, John E. Van Allen, Peter Van Gansbeck, Artemas Ward, and Paine Wingate.

Another motion was then made and seconded, that the House do come to the following resolution:

"Resolved, that the President of the United States be requested to cause a treaty to be entered into with any Indian tribes who may claim, hold, possess, or be entitled to, any lands within the Territory ceded by the State of North Carolina to the United States; and to endeavor to obtain, by such treaty, an extinguishment of the Indian claims to all lands, the pre-emptive right to which has been sold by the said State, in pursuance of the act of one thousand seven hundred and eighty-three, opening an office for the sale of the said lands."

Ordered, That the said motion be committed to Mr. WILLIAM SMITH, Mr. DARTON, Mr. SWIFT, Mr. McDOWELL, and Mr. PAGE.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the report of the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Gilbert Dench; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported that the prayer of the said petition ought not to be granted, and that the petitioner have leave to withdraw the same; which was agreed to by the House.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from the Secretary of War, enclosing certain confidential communications from Major General Wayne, dated the twenty-third of December last; which were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

MONDAY, February 2.

A memorial of sundry manufacturers of hemp in the town of Providence, in the State of Rhode Island, whose names are thereunto subscribed, was presented to the House and read, praying that a drawback of the duty imposed by law on the importation of foreign hemp may be allowed on the exportation of the same when manufactured into cordage within the United States.

Ordered, That the said memorial be referred to Mr. GOODRICH, Mr. WARREN, and Mr. HEISTER; that they do examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their opinion thereupon, to the House.

Mr. WILLIAM SMITH, from the committee to whom was committed the motion of the thirtieth ultimo, authorizing a treaty to be held for the extinguishment of Indian titles to lands within the Territory ceded to the United States by the State of North Carolina, made a report, which was read; whereupon, Ordered, That Wednesday next be assigned to take the said report into consideration.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, accompanying the report referred to in his letter of the thirtieth ultimo, for the improvement and management of the public revenue; which were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. GRIZZARD, from the committee appointed, presented a bill to provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining the Militia of the United States; which was read twice and committed.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to report the nett amount of duties arising on distilled spirits, and on country stills, (drawbacks deducted), during the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-two, showing how much thereof was collected in each State; what proportion of the whole has arisen on spirits distilled from foreign, and what from domestic materials, and the total expense of collecting in each State. Also, the same for 1793, so far as returns have been made; and where they have not been made, that he be requested to furnish an estimate of their net product, calculated on the return of 1793.

MILITARY ESTABLISHMENT.

The House, on motion of Mr. DAYTON, next resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, to take into consideration the report of the select committee relating to the Military Establishment. The Chairman having read the resolution recommended by the committee, in the following words, viz:

"Resolved, That two regiments, consisting of nine hundred and sixty men each, be formed out of the regiments now in the service of the United States, to compose, with the corps of artillery, the Military Establishment of the United States, and to continue in service until the first day of June, 1798, unless sooner discharged."

Mr. DAYTON said, that he disliked the report in general, and was more immediately opposed to the proposition on the table, which he should not agree to under any modification of which it was capable. It was his wish to have taken the sense of the Committee of the Whole upon his plan, by proposing to amend the one before them, but he found it could not be done consistently with the rules of the House, as it might with propriety be considered rather as a substitute than an amendment. If the one under consideration should be negatived, (and that such ought to be its fate, Mr. D. inferred, not merely from the insufficiency of the numbers proposed therein for the Military Establishment, but from the wording of it, which contemplated regiments—a term not at all applicable to the present system of organization, which was a legionary one)—then the way would be opened for him to offer to the House a proposition which he held in his hand for their information. Mr. D. then read it as follows, viz:

"Resolved, That the present Military Establishment of the United States be continued, and the corps composing the same completed by enlistments for a term not exceeding three years, with authority to the President to forbear to raise, or to discharge after they shall be raised, such part thereof as future events shall in his judgment render consistent with the public safety, convenience, and economy."

After reading it, Mr. DAYTON remarked, that he had been unfriendly to a reduction of the Establishment when the subject was some time since under discussion, and that he had heard nothing since to induce him to alter that opinion; on the contrary, two communications from different quarters had since that time been received, which very much strengthened it. He alluded to a letter from General Wayne, which was communicated under confidential instruction, but which was doubtless fresh in the recollection of every member of the Committee; and to a Report of the Secretary of War, made in consequence of a late request of the House directed to the President. The object, which he had in view was the effectual protection of the frontier, in a manner the least inconvenient and harassing to the Militia, and the most economical to the United States. There needed no proof that calls for the services of the militia were always attended with great embarrassment to our fellow-citizens who composed it, and with a waste of money which the other system would not occasion. Mr. D. wished to ascertain whether, in the present unsettled state of affairs, whilst Britain possessed our posts, and the Indians remained hostile, it was the sense of a majority that the Military Establishment ought to be reduced.

This produced a discussion, in which Mr. NICHOLAS, Mr. DAYTON, Mr. AMES, and Mr. MADISON, spoke. The latter gentleman seemed rather favorable to reducing than augmenting the number of troops in the service of the United States. He alluded to the report of the treaty said to be entered into between this country and Britain, from which it might be inferred that the Indian hostilities on the Northwest of the Ohio would slacken.

Mr. AMES, in reply to what had fallen from Mr. NICHOLAS, thought it would be bad economy to reduce the number of troops, which might tend to prolong the war. The latter gentleman having referred to the solicitude of Mr. AMES for paying off the Public Debt, which he considered as not quite consistent with his present desire of expending so much money on a Standing Army, Mr. AMES replied, that he believed the gentleman would be very much mortified to think that he possessed as little property as he [Mr. A.] did; that a report had been industriously circulated, as if the possession of public funds had an influence in that House on the votes of members; and this foolish calumny had been disseminated with so much industry as to have had an injurious effect on the minds of the public in some parts of the Union, and had much influence in serving the ends of some people.

Mr. SEAWORTH said, that it would be improper to diminish the preparations for war on account of any report afloat of a treaty with Britain; for if there was such a treaty, (which was not yet certain,) nothing could be counted upon it till ratified by the Government here.

The Committee rose, after disagreeing to the report. The Chairman reported progress, and the question being put, the House also disagreed to the report of the Committee.

TUESDAY, February 3.

A memorial of sundry manufacturers of paper, whose names are thereunto subscribed, was presented to the House and read, praying that so much of the Revenue Laws of the United States as imposes a duty on rags imported from foreign countries may be repealed; or that such other measures may be adopted for encouraging the manufacture of paper within the United States as to the wisdom of Congress shall seem meet.

Ordered, That the said memorial be referred to Mr. GOODHUE, Mr. WATTS, and Mr. HEISTER; that they do examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their opinion thereupon, to the House.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill to authorize the allowance of drawback on part of the cargo of the ship Enterprise; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose, and reported the bill without amendment.

Ordered, That the said bill be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

Ordered, That the report of the committee whom was re-committed the report of a committee on the report of the Secretary of War, respecting the fortifications of the United States, be committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Friday next.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on so much of the report of the committee appointed to inquire and report whether any, and what alterations ought to be made to the act imposing duties on snuff manufactured within the United States, as relates to an immediate alteration of the mode of collecting the duties on snuff manufactured within the United States; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported a resolution, which was twice read, and agreed to by the House, as follows:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to prepare and bring in a bill to amend the act laying duties on manufactured snuff, and to alter the mode of imposing the said duties, by imposing the same on the mortar.

Ordered, That Mr. WILLIAM SMITH, Mr. NICHOLAS, Mr. SAMUEL SMITH, Mr. LYMAN, Mr. FINDLEY, Mr. FITZSIMONS, and Mr. MADISON, be appointed a committee, pursuant to the said resolution.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill authorizing the erection of a light-house near the entrance of Georgetown harbor, in the State of South Carolina; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported an amendment, which was twice read, and agreed to by the House.

Ordered, That the said bill with the amendment, be engrossed, and read a third time.

MILITARY ESTABLISHMENT.

The House went into a Committee of the Whole on the Military Establishment of the United States, Mr. COBB in the Chair.

The resolution proposed by Mr. DAYTON was taken up, and Mr. GILES proposed, as an amendment, to strike out the word "three" from the resolution, which would then read "— years." Mr. G. introduced his amendment with some remarks, delivered in rather a low tone of voice.

Mr. S. SMITH had often been surprised at the way in which the Constitution was introduced into every subject. He never felt that surprise more sensibly than he did now. The member who spoke last had discovered that the raising of any army for the term of three years was disagreeable to the Constitution. He could not comprehend what Mr. GILES would be at. He was against a Standing Army; he was against a Militia. Mr. S. could not conceive what kind of support he would give the Government. Was he to depend solely on the virtue of the people? There were vicious characters in America, as well as elsewhere. Mr. S. asked if we are never to learn wisdom in military matters? When General Howe, with thirty thousand men, landed at Long-Island, the Americans raised a body of flying-camp men, who were to serve only for six months. The consequence was, that a great number of valuable citizens were just long enough in the service to be disgusted with it, but not long enough to learn the military exercise or imbibe military feelings. This short enlistment had a very bad effect. The same practice had been continued since that time, and had always produced mischief. Can there be any bad consequence of enlisting these men for three years, when we can have them at the same expense of bounty as if they were only for two years? Whenever a gentleman is at a loss for an argument, the Constitution is brought forward. The result would be, that when it was really useful to do so, the reference will be laughed at. There had been six-months men in the Army of St. Clair whose time was out, and who had left him just before his defeat. Men had been enlisted on so short a date, that their time was expired before they could be marched to the camp.

Mr. GILES.—The remarks of the gentleman last up are of so extraordinary a nature as to demand a reply. Mr. G. had not pointed out any obligation on the House by the Constitution to reject the term of three years. He never had been against a militia. [Mr. S. SMITH here said that the gentleman had said he was against any military force.] Mr. GILES denied the accuracy of his several quotations. He was a friend to a militia; he cleaved to a militia. How it came to be imagined that he would be against it, he was at a loss to conceive. There was a privilege in that House which Mr. G. would never give up to any man, and that was the privilege of speaking his opinion. He thought two years a long enough term; he should vote for it. If the men were wanted after that for a longer term, they could then be continued.

Mr. HARTLEY was for the longest term. It was a hard thing to call out the militia from their work. The supporting of the Army would be the shortest way to finish the war. The amendment was negatived by the Committee.

The question on the resolution itself was next called for.

Mr. FINDLEY said, it was with some reluctance that he rose on this question. He knew that on former occasions his support to the measures for increasing and continuing the Western Army was supposed to have been influenced by the situation of the Western counties of Pennsylvania. He hoped that when it was considered that the headquarters of the Army was near six hundred miles below Pittsburgh, and that this was the nearest post; and when it was also considered that the Indians of the Sanduskie, who harassed the frontiers of Pennsylvania and Virginia, had not been made an object of offensive operations, he hoped it would be believed that he was not influenced in his opinion on this question by his local situation. He went into a retrospect. The first offensive operation (General Harmar's expedition) was evidently undertaken without a competent knowledge of the strength and temper of the Indians, or of the influence by which they were supported; consequently it increased the war. The expedition of General St. Clair was also provided for on the same mistaken policy; it was likewise unfortunate, and the Indians became more formidable by greater combinations. These inadequate provisions for the Indian war cost much money, and protracted the war. These losses can be reimposed, but the abundant loss of human blood cannot be recovered or compensated; and these losses are justly chargeable to the want of competent force and short enlistments. When the present Army was directed to be organized, the number of troops as prescribed by the law and the time of service were competent, but the encouragement was inadequate. Mr. F. saw the consequences of this defect at the time, and endeavored to have the Army raised; but, though the House of Representatives had voted to increase the encouragement to the Army at different times, it failed in the Senate. The consequence was, that the number prescribed by law was never completed. But, though we had no more troops than the gentlemen have mentioned, that circumstance does not prove that the force was adequate. The reverse is rendered evident by undeniable facts. It is a fact, that the defence of the frontiers could not be combined with offensive operations, as was originally intended; nor was the Army fit to carry on the limited operations without a very expensive aid of the militia. This aid was not only necessary to assist in the most advanced and important operations, but even to guard the escorts of provisions. The attack made upon Major Adair with mounted volunteers, which was attended with the loss of lives, and of horses and stores, cannot be forgotten. The attack of the escort with wagons and stores on the road, and the loss of several brave officers and privates, and also the more formidable attack upon an advanced post, when, though the post was supported, the cattle and stores were taken to a great amount, and the lives of many of our valuable citizens lost, were all chargeable to the smallness of our force. But it is said that our future prospects have changed the situation of our affairs so much, as to render a smaller force competent to the object. What is this change? General Wayne has gained one victory, but is this a conquest? Or has it obtained a peace? No. It is far otherwise. The Indians do not sue for peace, not withstanding all our pacific endeavors to induce them to it; and emissaries, rendered active by their personal prejudices against us, even if they had no superior inducement, are as active in irritating the Indians as ever. The prospect of a treaty seemed to be considered as an essential change of situation; but supposing the reports of this to be well founded, it certainly was not yet confirmed on our part. We did not even know the terms; but, from what appeared, the relinquishment of the posts was to be suspended for a considerable time, and for the accomplishment of this we had only a promise in the treaty, and we had this before. However, he hoped this desirable object would be accomplished, but he could not extend his hopes beyond his confidence; and he acknowledged that his confidence was not perfect, but did not choose to explain his reasons; he thought it was not necessary. Pretences we knew could easily be found to evade the fulfilment of a treaty. He said that many arguments might be adduced to prove the propriety of completing the Army which it was not convenient to explain. Certainly it will not be pretended that the Southwestern Territory, or even Georgia, do not stand in need of more efficient assistance, or that these States would not have been better protected if the Army had been completed. He apprehended that the conduct and temper of the Southern Indians did not justify us in lessening our force. He hoped that further offensive operations against the Western Indians might not be necessary, but he thought that depending on possessing a sufficient force either for the defence of the posts, or offensive operations, as occasion might require.

Mr. DAYTON said, that the gentleman had laid down wrong premises, and thence it was no wonder if he had made wrong conclusions. He had said there was a chain of garrisons from the Ohio to the Lakes. Now, (said Mr. D.) there is no such chain. He said that the present Army had done the business. Now, (said Mr. D.) the Army alone did not do the business. There were 1800 mounted volunteers from Kentucky, four or five hundred militia in Georgia, and several independent companies in Pennsylvania; so that altogether the militia were as numerous as the regular Army. The gentleman asks the object of members who advocate this resolution. It was expressed yesterday. The object is, an economical, effectual defence of the frontiers.

Mr. MADISON, after all that had been said, was still of opinion that there had been a change in our situation, and so there might be a possibility that a reduction was proper. By the arrangements made in this session, it might be practicable to reduce the numbers, nominally, and yet have a real augmentation, because the new regulations would actually bring more men into the field.

Mr. SCOTT said, that the way to finish the war was to make it continue offensive, and pursue the Indians from one place to another, and let them know they should have no rest till they sued for peace. To reduce the forces back to a defensive war would be to have an eternal war, and be the most ruinous thing imaginable. There could not be a more wretched policy, in his opinion. The rumor of an intended reduction would induce other tribes to join those already at war with us. The British, who had blown the coal, who had done every thing in their power to excite the Indians to hostilities, would do so still. It should be remembered, that though the Indians had been defeated by General Wayne, the House were in possession of private information, that the British had attempted to rally them for another attack; and though British influence had failed for one time, there was no assurance that it would always fail. A great deal had been said about a change in circumstances: Mr. S. thought them changed for the worse. The ground only had been changed. He was for keeping up the Army at its full force. The mounted volunteers from Kentucky had cost as much to the public in four months as an equal number of regular troops did in twelve months. It would give Mr. S. the greatest pain if the resolution on the table miscarried.

Mr. FINDLEY explained the protection which he had said should be afforded to the frontiers, not to consist in scouting parties dispersed all over the frontier. He believed that the militia were fittest for this purpose. He only meant that the force should be such as to overawe the Indians where they were most formidable, and to carry out offensive operations when it was necessary. With respect to the amount of force necessary for the defence of the chain of posts and other necessary purposes, want of competent knowledge rendered a variety of opinions unavoidable. In cases where he was himself a competent judge, he was always against asking for or leaning on the opinion of the Executive. If the question was about the wages of the Army, he thought he was a competent judge; but with respect to the number of troops necessary for objects which actually existed, or probably might exist, he thought himself in a degree incompetent. He said, if he was a General to command an Army, he would not undertake it unless he judged the force competent; that the Executive, in the present instance, appeared to him in the same point of view, and would not be responsible for the consequences, if the force judged adequate was not granted. In point of expense or convenience, he thought little would be gained by the proposed reduction. It would not lessen the number of Generals, or of the Staff, nor of the stores and equipments of the Army, but only the pay of the number of officers and privates, which would be an inconsiderable saving compared with the danger of wanting a sufficient force. He knew the President was not hasty in filling the vacancies of officers where the privates were wanting; therefore, if privates could not be got, officers would not be unnecessarily appointed. He contemplated a day, not far hence, when, in making a Peace Establishment, a beneficial selection would be made of the best officers for that service; that if the Army was reduced now, and a selection of officers made for the remaining regiment, under the impression of another discrimination shortly to take place, it would probably produce fatal discontents in the Army. This, he thought, ought to be avoided, unless it became absolutely necessary.

Mr. RUTHERFORD said, that the American people had an insuperable aversion to regular military service. He did not mean, that when there was occasion for it, they were unwilling to fight, but that they were averse to entering into regular service for a term of years. It was next to impossible to keep men who enlisted from deserting: they always ran away from their officers. He did not by this mean to cast any reflection on the Army; he had long been a military man himself, and that from a very early period, and had the highest respect for the profession. He was understood to be unfavorable to the resolution.

Mr. HULLHOUSE thought that it would be the most unfortunate thing imaginable, if any idea were to get abroad that there was to be a reduction of the force. Even though there should be none in reality, yet the appearance of a reduction might be mistaken, and produce a wrong construction. He had no scruple in leaving the affair of dismissing the troops, when no longer wanted, to the discretion of the Executive.

Mr. CARNES said, Georgia and the Southwestern Territory have a frontier of at least eight hundred miles in extent. The number of troops proposed in the resolution is entirely inadequate to the defence of this frontier in general. We have had regulars in Georgia for several years, without the State receiving any benefit whatever from them. There is an antipathy between them and the regulars. At Fort Mattocks, (this was either the name, or a sound very like it,) an officer was applied to for a family near that post, and whom the Indians were preparing to murder. He answered, that he had been directed by his superiors to defend the ground which he stood upon. He accordingly called in his men, and suffered the people to be murdered. For six or seven years we have been giving the Creeks presents, and this always makes them come back again, as soon as their presents are disposed of, in order to commit fresh murders; and this always will be the case. He urged a declaration of war against them as the only way to reduce them to reason. He appealed to gentlemen, if the neglect shown by Government to the safety of the Southwestern frontier did not amount almost to a disgrace upon Government. The people had published the account of their sufferings in the newspapers, in the hopes that they would reach Congress, and induce them to do something, but all in vain. The number of troops proposed, said Mr. C., is not by one-twentieth part equal to the defence of your frontier. It had been said on this floor, that the troops were sent to the frontier of Georgia to protect the Indians against the white people, and it was the constant theme that the latter were always wronging the Indians. There was no evidence of this at all; and as there could be none, Mr. C. hoped that gentlemen would become more cautious in making such assertions. They do not care what kind of parade you make on your own side of the line, even with an hundred thousand men, if you please. They have said so. They know that declarations have been made of the garrisons being sent to protect them against the whites, and as long as they think so, there will never be any peace. You may give them presents, and make treaties with them, as long as you please. It is time to give a decided stroke instead of such trifling. Experience is the best tutor that we can apply to; and if we look back for six years, we shall find that the system of making presents has answered no good purpose. As to the charge of making encroachments on the Indians, Mr. C. knew only of two or three notorious characters at the most in Georgia, and these were mostly traders. People in general were perfectly disposed to peace. If fire and sword were once or twice carried into the Indian towns, and an assurance given that this would always be the case in future, when any murders were committed, they would soon learn to be quiet.

Mr. MURRAY would not believe this enormous story of an American officer permitting a family to be butchered before his eyes, unless Mr. C. would say, he had seen it himself. As to the militia of Georgia, six hundred of them had once been taken out in pursuit of a party of Indians, and, after coming on their trail, refused to go farther, and went home again. From this, Mr. M. inferred the necessity of having regular troops in the State to protect it.

Mr. CARNES rose again. He said that the story was true. He was not present, but he had it from an acquaintance in the militia, on whose veracity he could entirely depend. He could produce five or six affidavits on the affair. As to the men who returned from the Indian trail, the case was this. The Governor had entered into a correspondence with the Executive at Philadelphia, and it having been understood that the marching of the militia would be disagreeable to him, they were recalled on their way to the Indian country.

Mr. S. SMITH said the commanding officer in Georgia was a particular friend of his; and the observations of Mr. CARNES had struck deeply at the character of that officer. If any officer had really acted so, he ought to have been disgraced. Mr. S. gave a high character of the commander in Georgia, Major Geater, and read a letter from that gentleman, which tended to refute the assertions of Mr. CARNES, made the last session, relative to the defenceless state of the frontier. The Major said that the member from Georgia had certainly forgotten many things that he said in Congress, as well as many promises which he made when in Georgia. Mr. S. said that Mr. CARNES had certainly not foreseen the consequences of such a charge. The Major is liable to punishment. In his letter, he says, in contradiction to what Mr. CARNES asserts, that the Indians, for nine months past, have been remarkably peaceable, and not a horse has been stolen since the month of May. Mr. S. designed to have shown the letter to Mr. CARNES himself, and not to have made it public, but the precipitation with which the gentleman had advanced his charge, forced Mr. S. to produce it in defence of an absent and much respected friend.

Mr. CARNES had as high a respect for Major Geater as the gentleman himself, was well acquainted with him, and on amicable terms. He had also a very high opinion of the officers, and never had designed to make an attack on their characters. He considered them as gentlemen who knew how to act with propriety on almost every occasion, perhaps upon all occasions. He inquired the date of the letter now produced. Mr. SMITH replied that it was dated the 1st of January last. Mr. C. said, that when he went to Georgia, at the rising of the last session, he found that Major Geater had, from misapprehending him, taken amiss something which he had said on that floor. He gave him an explanation, and the Major seemed satisfied. He had not the least idea of injuring the reputation of officers. He did not carry that kind of malevolence about him. But he had a right to state what he knew to be facts; and for one, that of the massacre of a family, though they were so near the fort, that he believed the garrison might have seen the smoke of their chimneys. He did not, however, say that the officer in the fort was to blame. He might have potent reasons for what he did, though Mr. C. did not know them, and had, on that account, been cautious of saying any thing more than merely stating the fact, and this he apprehended that he was entitled to do. It was not at the conduct of particular persons that Mr. C. levelled his observations, but at the feeble defensive system which they were enjoined to pursue. He concluded by declaring, that he had a high opinion of Major Geater, and his conduct must have been misrepresented to that gentleman since they were last together, or he would not have written the letter in question.

The question was now called for and taken, and the resolution was agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the present Military Establishment of the United States ought to be continued, and the corps composing the same completed by enlistments, for a term not exceeding three years, with authority to the President to forbear to raise, or to discharge after they shall be raised, such part thereof, as future events may, in his judgment, render consistent with public safety, convenience, and economy.

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in pursuant to the said resolution, and that Mr. DAYTON, Mr. SAMUEL SMITH, and Mr. JEREMIAH WADSWORTH, do prepare and bring in the same.

WEDNESDAY, February 4.

An engrossed bill to authorize the allowance of drawback on part of the cargo of the ship Enterprise was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SHERBURNE, from the committee to whom was re-committed the report of the committee on the bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act to amend the act, entitled 'An act to establish the Post Office and Post Roads within the United States,'" made a report; which was read, and ordered to be committed to a Committee of the Whole House to-morrow.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill relative to the compensation of certain officers employed in the collection of the duties of import and tonnage; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported several amendments thereto; which were severally twice read, and agreed to by the House.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendments, be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

The following Message was received from the President of the United States:

Gentlemen of the Senate, and of the House of Representatives:
I lay before Congress, for their consideration, a Letter from the Secretary of State, upon the subject of Loans, which is extremely interesting and urgent.
G. WASHINGTON.

UNITED STATES, February 4, 1795.

The said Message and Letter were read, and referred to Mr. SEDGWICK, Mr. MADISON, Mr. BALDWIN, Mr. WILLIAM SMITH, and Mr. GILES, with instruction to examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their opinion thereupon, to the House.

The House, on motion of Mr. HEATH, went into a Committee of the Whole on the report of the select committee as to the progress made in settling the accounts of balances due to the old Government. This was accordingly done, Mr. Coss in the Chair. The report was read.

The first resolution in the report was, that further and more adequate provision ought to be made for recovering of debts due to the United States.

Mr. HEATH was in favor of the resolution. Mr. SEDGWICK thought any new regulations superfluous, as every precaution had been taken that could be taken.

Mr. WADSWORTH, in the discussion of this report, said, that he had got his own accounts with the United States settled, and to be sure it was much better that the thing was done, but he would not go through such a business again for twenty times the balance that he recovered. Many people had in despair given up the attempt. The resolutions were agreed to with amendments, and reported to the House. The galleries were then, at half past one o'clock, ordered to be cleared for reading of the communications from the President.

THURSDAY, February 5.

An engrossed bill relative to the compensations of certain officers employed in the collection of the duties of import and tonnage was read the third time, and passed.

A memorial of Oliver and Thompson, of the town of Baltimore, in the State of Maryland, mentioning that certain errors, made to the injury of the memorialists, in the payment of the duties on fifteen boxes of Irish linens and thirty pipes of Madeira wine, imported into the United States, in the years 1791 and 1792, may be rectified.

Ordered, That the said memorial be referred to Mr. SAMUEL SMITH, Mr. HULLHOUSE, and Mr. WINGATE; that they do examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their opinion thereupon, to the House.

Mr. TRACY, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the petition of George Gibbs, made a report; which was read. Whereupon,

Resolved, That the Collector for the port of Newport, in the State of Rhode Island, be, and he hereby is, authorized to allow to George Gibbs the legal drawback on certain wines, by him exported, in the month of December, 1790, in the ship Warren, to Calcutta: Provided, that the said George Gibbs shall produce all the other testimony (excepting the oath of the mate) required respecting drawbacks, by an act passed the 4th of August, 1790.

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in, pursuant to the said resolution, and that the Committee of Claims do prepare and bring in the same.

Ordered, That a committee be appointed to prepare and bring in a bill for continuing in force, for a limited time, an act passed the 3d of April, 1794, entitled "An act transferring, for a limited time, the jurisdiction of suits and offences from the District to the Circuit Court of New Hampshire, and assigning certain duties in respect to invalid pensioners, to the Attorney of the said District."

And a committee was appointed, of Mr. JEREMIAH SMITH, Mr. THATCHER, and Mr. PELLE WADSWORTH.

A memorial of the sugar refiners in the town of Baltimore, in the State of Maryland, was presented to the House and read, praying a revision of the excise laws of the United States, and that so much of the act passed at the last session of Congress, entitled "An act laying certain duties upon snuff and refined sugar," as imposes a duty on sugar refined within the United States, may be repealed.

Ordered, That the said memorial be referred to the Committee of the Whole House to whom is committed the report of the committee appointed to prepare and report a plan for the reduction of the Public Debt.

PUBLIC DEBT.

It was moved and seconded that the House should resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the report of the committee on reducing the National Debt, which was done accordingly, Mr. Coss in the Chair. The resolution was then read.

Mr. S. SMITH said, that he had not recollected before the House resolved itself, that he had in his pocket an address and remonstrance from the sugar refiners of Baltimore to submit to them. The Committee, on this account, rose. The address was then presented and read by the Clerk. It stated, in pointed terms, the oppressive effects attending the excise on refined sugar. When the address had been read, the Committee was resumed.

When this second resolution was last before Committee, Mr. S. SMITH had moved to strike the resolution out of the report.

Mr. FITZSIMONS believed that there had only been two of the taxes contained in the resolution complained of, viz: those on snuff and refined sugar. The auctioneers complained not of the tax, but wanted some particulars altered. This might be done, and it would be more candid to confine the motion merely to those parts of the resolution which had caused complaint.

Mr. HEISTEN said, that, in Pennsylvania, the tax on auctioneers had never, as he understood, been carried into execution. He was for dividing immediately into execution. He was for dividing immediately on the motion as it stood.

Mr. HILLHOUSE was also for a division on the question.

Mr. S. SMITH was anxious that the nature and extent of his motion might be understood. He had moved for striking out these taxes for the present, not to prevent the execution, but to suspend for the present the prolongation of an act which would expire in the end of the session of 1797. The taxes were confessedly experimental, and another year would enable the next Congress to decide much better whether they ought to be continued, than could be done at present. He hoped, therefore, that gentlemen would not mistake this motion, as if it went to an absolute negative of these taxes, when it was only temporary and conditional.

Mr. PAGE was likewise for striking out the clause. If good, at the end of the former term it could be renewed. But let the experiment be made.

Mr. SENECA.—Mr. Chairman, the principal question involved in that before the Committee is, shall permanent provision be made for the reduction of the Public Debt? As subordinate to this, is it necessary that the taxes laid last session, on loaf sugar, snuff, carriages, licences for retailing spirituous liquors and sales at auction, should be continued? The great subject then, of providing the means of reducing the Debt, is necessarily involved in the discussion. If it shall appear to be the duty of the Legislature to establish an efficient system for this purpose, and if it shall be demonstrated that these taxes are indispensable for that end, it will follow, that the resolution for their continuance should not be struck out until an adequate substitute is proposed.

When we take a retrospective view of the various stages through which the mass of Debt had passed previous to the Funding System; the extreme difficulty there was in executing that business; the agitations which attended it; the jealousies, suspicions, and animosities, which have resulted from it; when we call to mind the disunion and party which have flowed from this source; and when we reflect on the magnitude of our Debt; and when we know how anxious our constituents are to have it put in a train of reduction, we must conclude, that we ought assiduously to seek the means of effecting it.

The history of Public Debt is a very curious and instructive one. The facility with which they are increased, and the difficulty of reducing them, should form an useful lesson for American legislators.

When we compare our own Debt with the more enormous ones of some other countries, we are apt to console ourselves with its comparative smallness. I had intended to have given the history of the rise and progress of the British Debt, but when I reflect that it is a subject which is known to every gentleman, and must have been considered by them, I dare not trespass on the patience of the Committee. I will only take the liberty to observe, that, in the year 1697, when there were more anxious forebodings of ruin from that source than perhaps at any period since, the Debt of that country was comparatively less than ours is now. Had the Government then, in earnest, attempted a reduction, it might have been effectually done, with less annual revenue than is now required, in time of peace, for their ordinary expenditure.

Whenever a provision for the Public Credit shall be beyond the public faculties, confusion and ruin must be the consequence. That cause has destroyed the strongest Government in Europe. This we all hope will prove a blessing. The same event here would blast the best hopes of the lovers of mankind.

Among all the causes which have operated to prevent the reduction of Public Debts, none has been more influential than that of diverting revenues appropriated to that purpose to other objects. If our appropriations, of this kind, shall be violated, we may despair of our country being ever discharged of its load of Debts. To secure us against this evil, provision must be made, concomitantly with a Sinking Fund, for the other necessary expenses of Government, and also an allowance made for those unforeseen and contingent demands which cannot be computed, but which will always occur. Otherwise, we may be assured, unless America is to be exempted from the evils which have afflicted other countries, that our intention, however patriotic, will be defeated by a diversion of our permanent appropriations to temporary purposes. Our legislators may feel interested in the continuance of the Debt; they may want energy of character; they may be indolent; they may meanly dread a loss of popularity, from imposing necessary burdens, or all these may combine to form a precedent, which, when once established, we may bid adieu to hope.

This debate, if not productive of the effects originally designed, will certainly disclose to our constituents many things important, at least useful to be known. I most ardently hope that my wishes and expectations may not be disappointed, that no man observing on a contradiction of character and conduct, may justly use language such as this: Strange to behold! We see the men who have been represented as the friends of aristocracy, the men who had erected a Debt as the means, who rendered it irredeemable, that it might be perpetuated as the instrument of power and influence; these men we see striving, with all their might, and straining every nerve, for the adoption of an efficient system, for the gradual reduction and ultimate destruction of this monster of iniquity; while, on the other hand, not less unexpected, we perceive the friends of the people, as they have called themselves, the men who had fairly discovered that every political evil was stalking in the background of the frightful picture, which they had made of the Funding System; these men we behold, formed in solid columns, to defend this hateful spectre against the assaults of the knights of the Funding System.

The man who, twelve months since, would have dared to prophesy that a trifling tax on loaf sugar, snuff, and carriages, would have been put in competition with a reduction of our debts, would, without hesitation, have been pronounced either contemptibly weak or detestably wicked.

I did not think, at the commencement of our deliberations, it could have been necessary to have urged reasons for the reduction of the Debt. But the debate has taken a turn so new and unexpected, that I will take the liberty of stating some of the reasons which have struck my mind with the greatest force, why we should honestly unite in the attempt. Some of those reasons are general, and apply to all Governments; some are more peculiarly applicable to the circumstances of this country.

1st. A Debt, as an embarrassment to the faculties of a country, is an evil. To this there are, at some times, and in some countries, causes which counteract this evil, perhaps, in some instances, overbalance it; but I am confident those causes do not here operate to an extent which should induce us, for a moment, to suspend our efforts to reduce the Debt.

2d. A very cogent reason, and one which will influence every true patriot is, that our Debt has been made a principal and ostensibly almost the only source of party. No man, then, who wishes a union of councils, a fraternity of sentiments, will seek for plausible reasons to defeat this important measure.

3d. The experience of other countries has demonstrated a general disinclination in Governments to liberate the pledged funds of the community. Every extraordinary demand accumulates, of course, the Debt, and in the end must prove ruinous. It will be vain for us to profess ourselves the friends of Republican Government, and admirers of our political institutions, if we are not, by the examples of others, warned against this evil.

4th. A great portion of our Debt is owned by foreigners, and from the value of capital here, compared with other countries, we have reason to fear the evil will increase. It must be unnecessary to dwell on the impoverishing effects of a continued drain of specie from the community.

5th. The proposed measure will, in my opinion, beyond any expedient which could be devised, tend to fix the market price of our six per cent stock at par. This would make that species of Debt less a subject, and more an instrument of commerce; and instead of acquiring it would supply the place of capital; and it would also enable the Government to employ beneficially our surplus of revenues in purchases in the market.

6th. There are considerations peculiarly weighty at the present moment, which should stimulate us to the attempt to unshackle our faculties by a diminution of the Debt. Because, whatever our exigencies may be, we may be compelled to rely on our ordinary resources, without much aid from borrowing; for, from the smallness and value of capital here, we ought not to rely on domestic Loans; and the uncertain issue of the troubles in Europe, would prove it madness to depend on foreign aid.

7th. We ought to prepare to face the Deferred Debt; that we may not at once be compelled to impose too great an additional burden on our constituents. The Deferred Debt, when the whole shall be taken in, will probably amount to about 15,000,000 of dollars, and the annual interest to about 900,000. This is no trifling sum.

I suppose I shall be told that this reasoning is quite superfluous, that all will concur in an intention of creating an efficient Sinking Fund. We are indeed told, "be ye fed and be ye clothed," but I ask where are the food and raiment? We will appropriate, but where are the funds? A permanent provision by temporary or periodical grants is in itself a contradiction. For a Government to appropriate money without funds, is fallacious and absurd.

It is proposed by gentlemen with whom I have the honor to concur, to create a fund adequate to the payment of eight per cent. on the six per cent. Debts; to pay, as they accrue, the instalments of foreign Debt and of the Loan made of the Bank; to provide the means of speedily discharging the Loan of a million of dollars, authorized the last session for the purpose of foreign intercourse, and to aid the present Sinking Fund, if in our power, by applying annually all the surplus of revenues beyond our annual wants.

On the other hand, in all the calculations made by gentlemen opposed to continuing the taxes laid the last session, reference has been had only to the eight per cent. redeemable by the terms of the contract. The first observation which occurs here is, that if gentlemen do not wish to exert the public faculties beyond that point, there seems to exist no foundation for the complaint so loudly and so often repeated of the irredeemability of the Debt. For how can a prohibition to do a thing, which you have no inclination to perform, be considered as a grievance?

In these calculations, no allowance whatever is made for those unforeseen events to which all human affairs are liable. I will, at least for the present, waive this objection. I put out of the question the omission of the Foreign Debt, of that due to the Bank, and of the Loan which I have mentioned. I will, too, suppose the calculations to be just. We shall then be furnished with the means of paying $600,000, commencing the first payment the beginning of the next year. We shall then have made five annual payments before we are to meet the demand accruing from the Deferred Debt. This will amount to $3,000,000; and we shall, of course, have liberated an annuity equal to $180,000. This will not, however, enable us to face that additional demand; for I have already shown, that the annual interest of that will amount to about $900,000. So far, then, at that time, from being in a capacity to continue the operation of the Sinking Fund, additional taxes will be indispensably necessary to enable you to fulfil the public engagements.

Will gentlemen permit me to request them to compare the benefit to be expected from a reduction of the Debt, with the inconvenience of continuing the proposed taxes? Respecting the first, I believe it to be the greatest benefit the Legislature can confer on their constituents. It is, of course, the first duty which they owe them, and the thing, by them, of all others most desired. It is not, however, I agree, to be effected by taxes unequal and oppressive. The subjects of the taxes are principally, all must allow, articles of luxury. The taxes are certain, cheap in the collection, and do not increase the number of officers. There will be no distress of individuals in enforcing the collection, nor are any of the means used made use of for that purpose hostile to liberty. These circumstances seem to recommend them to the favorable attention of the Legislature. Yet to these taxes objections are made, as there certainly would be to any other, where self-interest is immediately concerned.

There is a very obvious reason why the manufactures of sugar are better defended than those of snuff and the other taxes. It is said, "that the tax on loaf sugar has not as yet the test of experience." This is equally true of every other species of tax which may be substituted, except only direct taxes, of which I shall say a few words before I sit down. "It is an American manufacture," it is true; but it is also true that the manufacture is so protected that the manufacturer has a complete monopoly; and, of course, if there is any truth in political calculations, the consumer must pay the tax. It is also true that, if you continue the protecting duties, and do not continue the tax, you give to the manufacturer a bounty equal to those duties, which, to the same amount, is a charge on the community. If you do not continue the protecting duties there is, of course, a further defalcation of revenue. "The tax will prevent the use of the article." Is there a man in the least degree acquainted with the subject who can for a moment believe that two cents a pound on loaf sugar can, in a single instance, affect the consumption. But, to conclude: It is said, "that the tax has already injured the manufacturer." I am willing to admit that, at the commencement and termination of every tax on a manufacture, and, perhaps on any other specific article, some inconvenience and embarrassment will be experienced, which will, however, by its continuance, as certainly be overcome as that an unagitated fluid will find its level.

But let it be granted that neither sugar, snuff, nor carriages, may, on experience, appear to be proper subjects of taxation; it cannot be a conclusive objection against the measure, for, by the terms of the resolution, these taxes are subject to repeal by the substitution of others; and, whenever the meditated evils shall appear, the Legislature will apply the remedy.

It is said to be an illiberal and unfounded jealousy to suspect gentlemen of insincerity. I mean not to make the charge. Let facts, however, speak for themselves. Have the gentlemen in the Opposition, however clamorous against others, ever proposed a system of their own? Do they now offer any substitute? Till the session before the last we neither sufficiently knew the wants nor the resources of our country to make an experiment. The House was then necessarily diverted from the consideration of a plan before them by the intervention of a subject equally interesting to the quiet of the community and to the reputation of a very meritorious officer. All remember the interesting subjects which exclusively occupied the attention of the Legislature at the last session.

The subject is now introduced. There was every reason to expect a united exertion for the accomplishment of this desirable object. Honor and character, independent of patriotism, it was foreseen would give union and energy to the friends of the Funding System. It was hoped that other motives would not be less operative with those who were its enemies. It is now said, "this is not the proper time, the business may as well be done at the next session." I ask gentlemen why not as well at the present? If honor, the good wishes and blessings of the people, will attend the authors of the measure, I invite gentlemen to accept them. If toils are to await the execution, I beseech them to encounter the honorable task. Why leave the glory to our successors? May not they, for the same reason, leave it to theirs? This disposition for postponement and leaving till "to-morrow, and to-morrow, and to-morrow," things which might as well be done to-day, has been the cause why public debts have been ruinously entailed on other countries.

It is said that loaf sugar, snuff, carriages, &c., are not proper subjects? What, then, shall we substitute? It is said "direct taxes." Have they not already been tried and rejected? Have not these been approved for purposes not more important than those now proposed? Is there not an evidence of insincerity in proposing rejected taxes as a substitute for those which have been adopted? Does not every gentleman know that the proposed substitute is inadmissible? But, if gentlemen are in earnest, why bring they not forward their proposed scheme of direct taxes as the means of reducing the Debt? If the Debt is what they have constantly represented it, is it not a duty incumbent on them equally with their brethren to attempt its reduction?

A gentleman [Mr. FRANKLIN] has said, that, by the act imposing the temporary taxes, the faith of Government is pledged against their being continued. Why, then, continue the additional impost, to which he has assented, which was equally temporary in its creation? But can the gentleman be serious in this? Does the imposition of a land tax one year pledge the faith of the Government that it shall not be continued the next? I have understood this gentleman to say that such taxes as those under consideration were to be made temporary by way of experiment. But the gentleman has discovered that the Government can derive no benefit from the experiment without a violation of its faith. This consequence then follows, that no article of manufacture, no specific article, can be rendered a source of permanent revenue. This at least is a new discovery.

One gentleman [Mr. McDOWELL] has proposed another substitute, taxing the Debt itself. [I will, in answer to this, only observe, that this would be indeed a Sinking Fund.

I cannot help observing what has been often repeated here, that the Government ought not to repose itself on imposts and tonnage alone, because it is a resource which war would annihilate, and because it is putting the patriotism of the merchant to too severe a trial.

The arrangement of our Treasury Departments, to my mind, evinces great wisdom and political discernment. It is thereby not only competent to the Secretary, but made his duty, from time to time, to report "plans" for the improvement of the revenue and the orderly administration of the finances. That officer, in the discharge of this important duty, has laid before the Legislature an able and comprehensive system, embracing the particular subject now before us.

The statement which he exhibits respecting the revenue, does not, as others with which we have been favored do, entirely omit the important articles of foreign debt, that due to the Bank of the United States, and the considerable loan, authorized by the act of the last session, of $1,000,000, for purposes of foreign intercourse. To leave the two first items unprovided for would at once sacrifice the national interest and violate the public faith.

To leave the last without effectual means of speedy payment, would be, in time of peace and unexampled prosperity, to increase the National Debt. The palpable omissions and mistakes which have been made in all our calculations, should induce us to hesitate whether more respect is not due than has lately been paid to official information and responsibility.

I have very great confidence in the gentleman who was at the head of the Treasury Department. His talents are acknowledged by all; his integrity is, I believe, incorruptible, and his industry indefatigable. Hitherto, he has never deceived us, and he can now have no possible motive to do it. Added to these considerations, he is responsible, not only in this country, but abroad, by his reputation and well-earned fame, dearer than life, not to mislead; and, besides, he has the best means of accurate calculation; and, what I suppose will be allowed as an additional reason for confidence, is, that he is not now devising means of official or personal power and influence, being at the time he made his report, about to retire voluntarily and to mix with the mass of the people. If, on the one hand, however, it will not be expected of any to receive conclusively the statements and deductions of the Secretary, on the other, candor will compel those who reject, to disprove them. For myself, I shall assume it as a fact that his statements are just, and afford the only means of accurate calculation.

To secure the important purposes of reducing our debts, preserving inviolably the public engagements, and providing the means of funding the Deferred Debt, without being compelled to extraordinary exertions at that time, it will, according to the Secretary's report, be necessary to continue all the existing taxes. The surplus beyond the known objects acknowledged as necessary to be provided for, amounts to no more (speaking in round numbers) than $140,000—a sum certainly not too large to answer those contingent and unforeseen demands for which all Governments, in establishing permanent systems of this kind, ought to provide.

As the Secretary proposes the taxes of last session shall be appropriated to temporary purposes, it may be asked, why they should now be continued until the year 1801? To this I answer, 1st. Because we have now evidence that they will, according to the existing state of things, be necessary. 2d. Because that, unless temporary objects of necessary expense are provided for, there will be danger that the permanent appropriations will be violated. 3d. Because a conflict of interests, passions, and theories, renders it, as our experience has demonstrated, extremely laborious and difficult to impose any tax, and, from its prolonging the session of the Legislature, expensive to our constituents. And, 4th. Because, as upon another occasion, I have undertaken to show there are real embarrassments at the commencement and termination of all taxes on specific articles, which are overcome by their continuance. To this it may be added, that should it fortunately happen that we should not be able to lessen our expenses, we shall, in the same proportion, reduce our Debt. This, I hope, no man will consider as an evil.

Mr. LYMAN objected to the gentleman who was last up, speaking as if the report before the Committee was the peculiar property of himself and a part of the members. The report and estimates were made at the desire of the whole House. He stated a variety of objections which had been made to the taxes specified in the resolution, and to go to discontinue them now, before their effects were thoroughly known, would, in his opinion, be highly improper. Among other observations that had been used on this subject, he objected to the expression that voting or refusing to vote for the immediate continuance of these taxes, would be a test of character.

Mr. NICHOLAS said, that he would state what the question really is. For two years longer you have these taxes to do every thing with which the gentleman proposes. Where, then, is the necessity, where is the propriety, of continuing them just now? The gentleman from Virginia who is opposed to this clause, act from the most disinterested motives. No country depends more upon importation than theirs, and yet they never complained of imposts. They complain not of taxes the most burdensome to themselves. The reason why the refiners of sugar complain is because they say the tax oppresses them; and the sole reason why gentlemen support this opposition is, because they are of opinion that the complaint of the manufacturers is well founded. It was a ridiculous inference to allege that the Virginians are averse to taxation. Mr. N. was informed that the British never had imposed any tax of this nature on the refining of sugar. Mr. N. had no concern with the taxes of snuff and sugar personally, for, of the one, he took very little, and of the other none at all. As to the auction tax, it never had been brought to operate in Virginia. No person qualified in consequence of the act of last session. A great part of the speech of Mr. N. consisted of calculations on the present state of the finances.

Mr. GILES observed, that a bystander would imagine that there was a proposal for repealing a tax. There is no such thing. It is merely against the present continuance of an old one, after the term for which it was voted, and of which two years are yet unexpired. With all this warmth and agitation, if we vote in the affirmative, we shall not add one cent to the existing revenue of the Union; and, if we vote in the negative, we shall not take one cent from that revenue. But if you once include the taxes before the Committee in a perpetual system of taxes, you give to the Senate exactly the same power which you now have of negating an appeal, and the President also has a second negative; so that each of these two branches of the Legislature receives equal power with yourselves, for both can negative a repeal. Mr. G. said, that to one of the taxes in the resolution he had an objection, though he believed it one of the least unpopular of the whole. This was the tax on carriages. He had always been against it. Gentlemen had spoken of calling into exertion the great revenue faculties of this country. He could not imagine that a few petty excises were to be called the great revenue faculties, nor did he ever think that such taxes would promote the reduction of the Public Debt. Some great and general effort must be made. He thought that the present question might have been contracted into a very narrow compass, and that there had been no occasion for so many diffusive remarks on it.

Mr. W. SMITH observed, that though the two principal objections to the report, when last under consideration, were quite opposite in their nature; yet, that it was less difficult to answer them both, than to reconcile them with each other. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. SMITH] was opposed to the continuance of the new taxes, among other reasons, for the following: that there would be sufficient revenue to answer the purposes contemplated by the plan without those taxes; whereas, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MADISON] was opposed to them, because they would produce but a paltry sum, totally inadequate to the great object of the reduction of the Debt. Leaving it to the gentlemen to reconcile this variance, he would endeavor to satisfy the Committee that both the objections were groundless.

With respect to the first, a reference to the report would show the gentleman from Maryland, that the plan therein submitted contemplated two objects, the redemption of the Debt by payment of six hundred thousand dollars annually, being the sum redeemable at present, and the purchase of the Debt when not above par—to effect this, the report suggested two propositions, one to appropriate permanently sufficient revenues for the annual redemption; the other, to appropriate the annual surpluses of revenue to occasional purchases. These points, Mr. S. said, he had fully noticed on a former occasion, when he had developed the views of the select committee and explained the principles of their report, and had, he thought, satisfactorily shown that, without the aid of the taxes in question, it would be impossible to attain even the first object, the redemption. As this point was now questioned, he would repeat that the existing impost and excise on distilled spirits did not yield a revenue adequate to the discharge of the current expenses, the interest of the Debt, and the redeemable part of the principle; this would appear from the following concise statement:

Current expenses, as per acts of appropriation
Interest of Debt	$2,594,000
Redeemable part	3,100,000
	800,000
	6,294,000
The impost was estimated at
The excise on spirits,	5,500,000
	400,000
	$5,900,000
Deficiency	394,000
	$6,294,000

In the above, the Bank dividends are not included. They are computed at fifty thousand dollars per annum, and may be set off against contingencies; the avails of the Post Office will probably be absorbed in the expenses of that Department. Thus it is demonstrable, that, to secure certainty in the reduction of the Debt, as far as the right reserved, these new taxes, or some others, must be resorted to. But, admitting, for argument sake, the full force of the statements of the gentleman, it would still leave the second and very essential object of the plan unsatisfied, namely, the purchase of the Debt. From accurate calculation, it appears that, if we begin this year the redemption of the Debt, and confine ourselves merely to the payment of the two per cent. of the principal, it will require nearly thirty years, before the whole of the six per cent., including Deferred Debt, will be discharged, and we shall then still have nearly twenty millions of three per cent., and fourteen millions of Foreign Debt on our hands. We must, therefore, place our greatest dependence on the purchasing up the Debt, and for that valuable purpose, we must have large surpluses of revenue every year, besides a stable and unalienable fund for the gradual redemption. In this mode advantage will be taken of the fluctuations in the funds, and the Debt will be diminished with rapidity and on cheap terms; a double operation will then be performed; two per cent. of the principal will then be regularly and annually discharged, even though the Debt should be above par, and beneficial purchases will be made whenever it is at or under par.

Mr. S. said, he saw more solidity in the reasoning of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. MADISON.] when he complained that the proposed taxes did not go far enough; but still the reasoning of the gentleman did not conclude against those taxes, it only proved that there ought to be others in aid of them; and so anxious was Mr. S. for the speedy reduction of the Debt, that, whenever the gentleman should think proper to propose others, in that way in which alone they could claim consideration, he would give them his assent, unless they were such as were liable to insuperable objection, and such he did not expect the gentleman would ever recommend. The same gentleman had objected to these taxes, as being very oppressive and little productive, and therefore advised a recurrence to a direct tax on property, which would bring one or two millions of dollars into our coffers. This mode of reasoning was similar to that which prevailed at the last session, when the urgency of our situation suggested the necessity of a naval armament; on that occasion it was objected that the force was incompetent to the object, and yet there was no attempt by those who made the objection to render it competent; it was objected that we ought to negotiate with the Algerines, and not irritate them by an armament; and yet it was then known that one negotiation had been tried ineffectually, and that a liberal provision was made for another to accompany the armament. So, on this occasion, it is objected, that the proposed taxes are inadequate, but there is no attempt either to increase them or substitute others: a direct tax is suggested, (but not proposed,) in lieu of these, though it is well known that, at the last session, these were preferred to a land tax by the Committee of Ways and Means, consisting of a member from each State, of which the gentleman from Virginia was one; and that, when it was proposed in the House, there were not ten members who voted for it, even with the prospect of war before our eyes; and though the proposition under debate is accompanied with this value shall be laid, these taxes shall cease. The opposition on this subject is in all respects parallel with that of the one alluded to in the last session; and, as on that occasion, the House thought the urgency of the case called for the adoption of the remedy proposed, though, perhaps, not the best; so, on the present occasion, Mr. S. trusted the House would agree to the proposed plan, unless a better was brought forward. When the House had, by an unanimous vote, resolved that further provision ought to be made for the reduction of the Debt, he little foresaw the opposition which the report had encountered; the Committee had, in the discharge of their duty, paid much attention to the subject, and, as the result of their labors, had reported the plan on the table; it was now several weeks since it had been printed and undergone discussion, and yet, after all the objection to it, nothing had been digested by way of substitute, and when the session is drawing to a close, it is proposed to reject it altogether, and leave the subject where we found it. Would the public be satisfied with this? Would they be reconciled by being informed that so valuable an object as the reduction of the Debt—one which they have so much at heart—had been defeated by the means of half a dozen manufacturers of snuff and loaf sugar? Will our constituents approve of our throwing away valuable funds in hand, and which are applicable to this important object, and depending upon mere visionary speculations of taxes, which may never be laid, or which, if laid, will not be realized for years to come? Will not the public be induced to suspect that there is something of party in this matter; and that one side object, because another side propose; and, how-ever groundless the suspicion, would not designing men give it this complexion? For his part, so desirous was he of securing the object, that any other plan, from whatever quarter it came, which would be consistent with policy, should receive his assent; on this occasion, more than on any other, he would say, "Tros Tyrannos miki nullo discrimine agitur;" even now, though so much time had been bestowed on this report, he would consent to withdraw it, if gentlemen in the Opposition would show him another mode equally adequate to the object; but, until they did, he felt it his duty to support it.

If gentlemen are serious, said Mr. S., in their intention to propose a land tax, and have any hopes of its passing into a law, what possible objection can they have to the report? Does it not, in express terms, hold this language, that these objectionable taxes shall cease as soon as any others of equal value shall be substituted? If the language of the report is not sufficiently explicit, I am willing to make it more so, and to provide in another clause, which the gentlemen may word as they please, to this effect:

"That as soon as a direct tax on property to the amount of these taxes shall be laid, then they shall ipso facto cease."

Either they believe that a direct tax will pass, or that it will not: if they believe that it will, then they are certain that these taxes will cease; if they believe that it will not, then they must be sensible that, without these taxes are continued, the Debt cannot be paid. If it be said that it is hazardous to put it in the power of the Senate to prevent the passing of a land tax, and thus repealing these taxes, it may be answered that, if the Senate are indisposed to the reduction of the Debt, they will not apply these taxes to that purpose; if they are disposed to reduce it, they will adopt the most efficacious means, and, as the gentlemen say, a direct tax will be the most efficacious, of course the Senate would prefer it.

It has been said, that there is no necessity at this time to determine whether these taxes ought to be continued or not, and that it ought to be left to the next Congress. It is somewhat strange to complain of the existence of the Debt, to express the utmost solicitude for its abolition; and yet, when it is proposed to take measures for that purpose, to ask why it could not as well be done next year? To postpone the plan for another year, will certainly evince less zeal for the reduction of the Debt than to adopt it now; when anything on this subject is done, it must be systematic and permanent. To resolve at this season to discharge the first redeemable instalment, and leave it to future Legislatures to pay the second or not, and so on from year to year, according to the changeable disposition of different Houses, would very much postpone the ultimate redemption, and throw the accounts into the utmost confusion and perplexity at the Treasury Department, embarrass the public creditors, and even put in jeopardy the public credit.

Mr. S. here produced a table, containing statements and calculations, showing the period of time in which the six per cents would be redeemed according to the right reserved, distinguishing the present and deferred Debt, the amount of principal and interest, applicable to each for each annual payment; the amount of each annually, after deducting the payment of the preceding year; and the value of the Debt every year, after the reduction commences, calculated on a certificate of one hundred dollars.

From this table, Mr. S. said, it must appear that when once the reduction was begun, it must be persevered in. New books and accounts must be opened at the Treasury; a table of reduction must be kept to be resorted to, as a standard by which to graduate the annual diminution of each certificate, and the consequent reduction of interest on it; if the system be permanent, there will be no great difficulty after the business is organized at the Treasury, but, if it be fluctuating, every year will require new books, new calculations, and the labors of innumerable clerks to adjust the accounts to the change; and this would not be the only difficulty, for, as new certificates will not be issued after every payment, and probably there will not be even an endorsement on the old certificate of the payment made, nothing but certainty of the annual payment can protect purchasers from endless frauds: the certificates in foreign parts would create the greatest perplexity, if the payment of the two per cent. were not as certain as that of the interest. Mr. S. said, he had consulted the principal officers of the Treasury on this point, and they were decidedly in sentiment with him that it would be better not to commence the reduction until we were certain we could persevere in it. He therefore pressed these considerations to convince gentlemen, that if we mean now to enter on the subject, we must not only make a systematic and durable arrangement, but we must pledge for the purpose certain and adequate funds, not liable to be withdrawn, but by the substitution of others of equal productiveness. It was further to be remarked, that, by suffering a year to elapse without availing ourselves of the right to redeem, we lost a year effectually, for we could not carry the payment of that year to the credit of the next, the right reserved being only to pay two per cent. in each year. Mr. S. flattered himself that these explanations would be a satisfactory reply to those gentlemen who had asked what occasion there was for doing anything more this session, than simply appropriating six hundred thousand dollars for the first instalment. He had sought for every information on this subject, and he was convinced that the mere appropriation of that sum, without completing the system, would be attended with more injury than benefit.

The question which had been raised by the gentleman from Virginia, namely: whether we should enlarge the system of excises or apply to direct taxation, was unnecessarily raised on this occasion, and could have no other effect than to mislead the Committee from the true point.

The plan reported, and the statements from the Treasury, proved that the existing revenues were sufficient to discharge the redeemable part of the Debt, to pay all the current expenses, and to leave some surplus, which might be applicable to purchase of the Debt. If, after the system reported shall be adopted, it shall be thought that the surplus for purchases will be too small, then will be the proper time to propose new revenues in order to augment that resource, and then will the question of the gentleman from Virginia be regular; then let it be determined whether a complete system of excises or a land tax shall be the fund for farther purchases of the Debt. It must be obvious that, to lead the Committee into that inquiry at present would be only to bewilder them in a maze of inexhaustible debate; it would be pursuing an ignis fatuus which would seduce us from the subject before us, never to resume it this session; it would be losing the substance to grasp at a shadow.

The unproductiveness of these taxes has been assigned as a reason for their discontinuance, at the same time that they are complained of as burdensome. They were expected to yield near four hundred thousand dollars, which was as much as the excise on distilled spirits, and no contemptible sum; it would pay two-thirds of each instalment, and was a growing revenue: it was, however, obnoxious, that, though the motion struck at the whole of the taxes, all the artillery of Opposition was pointed only at the snuff and sugar taxes, and, indeed, latterly, the objections to the former had diminished, and the sugar-bakers seemed to be the principal favorites with the Committee; as to the persons affected by the others, they had not been even so much as mentioned in the debate. Was it right to destroy all these revenues, merely because the sugar tax was improper? Mr. S. had never expected that the snuff and sugar taxes would have been selected by the opponents of the report, for really they appeared to him the least exceptionable of the whole; he never could believe that the articles of snuff and sugar ought to be exempt from taxation, while coffee, bohen tea, and salt, were not. He never could consent to pay a bounty of ninety thousand dollars a year to the manufacturers of snuff and sugar. To prove that the remission of these taxes operated as a bounty, Mr. S. stated that the protecting duties which had been laid by Congress on the foreign articles being so high as to amount to a prohibition, the articles, of course, were not imported; by continuing the protecting duties, the impost on those articles, which would amount to ninety thousand dollars, was thus lost to the United States, and would be a bounty to the manufacturers, if the revenue were not obtained by excise. Suppose Congress were to take off the protecting duties on loaf sugar, and leave the manufacturers to the foreign competition, could they justly complain? Might it not be said, the protecting duties have been laid long enough to encourage the manufacture, and to bring it to maturity? You have not only the monopoly of the home supply, but your sugar is become an article of exportation; since you are unwilling that the West Indies should derive a revenue from it through you, they must get it by an impost. Another objection has been made against the continuance of these taxes; they are said to be temporary, and ought, therefore, to be applied to temporary objects, such as the Military Establishment, and the permanent object of the reduction of the Debt. It was rather a strange objection to argue from a peculiar quality of the object under consideration, when the whole question and essence of the controversy, was, in fact, whether the object should possess that quality? Whether certain revenues should be temporary or permanent, depended on Legislative will, and when the proposition was to make certain temporary taxes permanent, it was no answer to say that they are now temporary. It should be shown that these taxes are temporary in their nature and quality. The duty on coffee, bohea tea, and salt, are permanent. Is there less permanence in the nature of a duty on refined sugar and snuff? The former are consumed by the poorer classes of society; the latter, by the wealthier. Is that a reason why the former should be permanent, and the latter temporary? But, if there did exist any difference in the nature of these revenues, the argument was the other way; for these duties being internal, were in general less liable to be affected by wars than the impost, and were, consequently, of a more permanent nature than the impost, and therefore more suitable for the purpose to which they are designed. Besides, the very substitute recommended for the additional impost of last session, is a temporary revenue.

There remained one further objection to answer. It was asked, why we did not extend excises to nails, shoes, paper, and many other articles manufactured in the United States, of which the manufacturers have as much the monopoly of supply, as of snuff and sugar? Several answers occurred to this objection. In the first place, the fact is not admitted that these have the monopoly of supply; again, it does not follow, that because one article is to be excised, all are. In laying taxes, many things are to be taken into consideration, the nature of the commodity, whether it can bear a tax, whether a necessary or a luxury, the mode of collection, its cheapness, and simplicity; whether it will fall on the maker or on the consumer. The articles of snuff and sugar possess every essential of a good tax: to show that, because they can bear a tax, the other articles can also, the gentlemen should show that the other articles possess the same qualities.

Mr. S. said, he believed he had answered every objection to the snuff and sugar taxes, and consequently every objection to the principal part of the report; for it would be observed, that gentlemen in the Opposition had made the whole merit and existence of the report hinge upon those two articles. The question was, therefore, now on the very existence of the plan; for, if the present motion should obtain, he saw an end to all their labor for this session. However he might regret its failure, and the further postponement of so interesting a subject, he should endeavor to console himself with the reflection, that he had, early in the session, brought the subject forward; that he bestowed considerable attention on it, and had used all his endeavors to accomplish at this time a plan, which, if adopted, he was certain would effectuate the discharge of the National Debt in a very short period. If the conduct of members on this occasion is to be exhibited to the public as a criterion of their sincerity in wishing the speedy discharge of the Debt, he was desirous that the public should know the part he had acted, and he was confident that, when a comparison should be drawn between those on the one side, who had early and zealously brought forward and defended a plan for the reduction of the Debt, and at the same time shown a willingness to accede to any other equally efficient; and those on the other who had combated this plan with no small perseverance, merely on account of their dislike to one or two articles of taxation, without offering anything as a substitute, (except holding out the idea of a remote and almost impracticable expedient,) his conduct would safely undergo the strictest scrutiny.

Mr. GILBERT rose.—By this time several members were ready to go away, and the question having been repeatedly called for, the gentleman was going on, when

Mr. NICHOLAS observed, that he was entitled to be heard, as he had got up before a motion that was just made for adjournment.

Mr. B. BOURNE observed on the impossibility of the gentleman being heard, when the House were just going.

Mr. SPOWICK noticed that he should have the freedom of the floor to-morrow.

Mr. GILBERT said, that he did not wish to tire the Committee.

The Committee then rose, and the House immediately adjourned.

FRIDAY, February 6.

An engrossed bill for the erection of a lighthouse, near the entrance of Georgetown harbor, in the State of South Carolina, was read the third time and passed.

Mr. FRIZZMONS, from the committee appointed to inquire into the establishment of clerks in the several Departments, made a report; which was read, and ordered to be committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday next.

Mr. FITZSIMONS, from the committee to whom was referred the memorial of William Gardner, made a report; which was read, and ordered to be committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday next.

THE PUBLIC DEBT.

The House then went into a Committee on the unfinished business of yesterday; the amendment of Mr. S. SMITH was before them for striking out the second resolution in the report of the select committee on the means of reducing the National Debt; Mr. COMBS in the Chair.

Mr. TACOT said, that when he was up before on this question, he had stated that some of the sugar-bakers in New York were not, in their own opinions, oppressed by the excise on loaf sugar, and that the raw material had been cheaper there than usual; this had in part been contradicted by a gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. S. SMITH], who had said that the low price alluded to was by an accidental and single purchase. Mr. T. said, he was now furnished with ample documents to show that the raw material in New York had been at least ten per cent. cheaper for a number of months back than usual, which enabled the refiners to sell loaf sugar at the same price which they did before, and yet collect the excise from the consumer. He had asked, when up before, if the manufacturers complained anywhere but in Philadelphia. He now was ready to assert, that they did not complain, excepting in Philadelphia and Baltimore. The principal ground of complaint, contained in the petition now before the Committee, from the refiners in Baltimore, was, that they had not the advantage of speedy sale as those had who lived in larger towns. This Mr. T. said, could not apply to the manufacturers in Philadelphia. And as the chief complaint before the Committee was from the city of Philadelphia, which was quoted by those in favor of the motion for striking out the resolution, he wished to be indulged in a few remarks upon the weight, which, in his opinion, the complaints of the Philadelphia refiners ought to have. It was said by a gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. NICHOLS], that the manufacturers in this city declared they paid the excise themselves and could not collect it from the purchaser; and that we ought to believe them. To this he answered, that the respectability of the sugar-bakers in Philadelphia was unquestionable; yet, before their opinions and declarations ought to influence the Committee, he thought a fair examination of their opinions and conduct, and a comparison of them with the opinions and conduct of the sugar-bakers of New York, &c., ought to be had. Upon the first idea, in Congress, of laying an excise on loaf sugar, &c., the manufacturers in this city had been constantly opposing the motions of Government. This opposition had been kept up until the law had passed through all its stages; and, as if they meant to move Heaven and earth against it, when the Legislature of Pennsylvania sat last Summer in that most critical period, they petitioned the Legislature to interfere officially, and, if possible, induce Congress to repeal the excise law. This was done in such terms, and by some persons at least, from whom we had a right to expect support to the laws, that it could not fail powerfully to attract the attention of every person who regarded the peace and happiness of his country. And yet a sense of the impropriety of this conduct seems not to have found its way to the minds of the manufacturers in this city, excepting Peter and Henry Mierken, who, Mr. T. said, formed a very honorable exception; but the exception was a solitary one. They publicly declared against the propriety of such a step. Now the manufacturers tell us that they must pay the whole excise themselves, and its operations are ruinous to them. And they add, loaf sugar is at the same price now that it was before the excise was laid, and that the excise prevents the consumption. It was a well known fact, Mr. T. said, that large purchases were made antecedent to the excise law taking place; perhaps the excise did it on purpose to avoid paying the excise. This might be one reason why the price was not increased; another was, the diminished price of raw sugars. It was the case when the excise was laid on spirits. An over-purchase kept the price where it had been for some time after the law took effect; but very soon the excise and a profit on it was added; so it would be in this case. Mr. T. said, that the consumption of loaf sugar was not lessened by the excise, he had authority to say, from all the information he had from the grocers in this city, in New York, and elsewhere; and if the manufacturers of this city were accurate, in saying that they paid the excise themselves, he asked how it could possibly lessen the consumption? And he said he believed he was stating with accuracy, when he said that one sugar-baker at least, in this city, actually did, or at least proposed to make out bills to his purchasers, in three columns, one containing the price of the sugar, the next the excise, and the third the whole amount, but this he did not know that he could prove. If this were true, he asked who paid the excise, and why should such a thing be done, but to stir up uneasiness in purchasers, that the burden was thrown on them? Now the cry is, the purchaser or consumer did not pay the duty; but it fell on the poor depressed manufacturer. Mr. T. agreed that it would be no more just, wantonly, to take money from a rich man than a poor one, but humanity called with more force in favor of the latter. How was it in this case? Were the manufacturers in this city poor and depressed? He said he remembered a petition of these very manufacturers, but lately read in Congress, in which they say that they will immediately pay their proportion of the Public Debt, if we will let them know the sum; yet they cannot pay a small excise without utter ruin! They deny their ability or will to pay, even in the first instance, a small excise, and yet wish to pay down their proportion of eighty or ninety millions of dollars, and from every appearance this proportion must be made out on very ample fortunes; so that the sum which they offer to pay down must be large. We have been told in this House of a dangerous moneyed influence, of paper noblemen, and purse-proud aristocrats; but what is this conduct the result of? Not of poverty, to say no more of it. Mr. T. was not confident, but he was tolerably certain, that the dry goods merchants of this city remonstrated against the impost when it was first established; the manufacturers are now complaining of the excise. Is there any thing peculiar in Pennsylvania that the laws of this Government can never go down quietly with its inhabitants? He was willing to appreciate the State, and the manufacturers, and think very highly of them; but he was as willing to think well of the manufacturers in New York and elsewhere, and to give as much credit to their statements. He declared, if he were convinced the tax would eventually fall on the manufacturer and not on the consumer, he would vote for striking out the resolve; but he said it could not be determined yet, by experiment, which was the only proper test of a tax. He declared he thought that even the manufacturers themselves could not tell unless the taxes were kept in being for a longer time than two years. He believed to continue the excises laid last session of Congress until 1801, would give us the experimental test much better than to try it only for so short a time, and that he was opposed to the limitation when the taxes were first laid; but the limitation was moved by a gentleman who had opposed the excises in every step; and Mr. T. understood that an accommodation was to take place in consequence of the limitation, but after the limitation was added, not a man voted for the bills who had, before that addition, opposed them. He very much regretted, then, that the limitation was admitted at all; and should have opposed it, but from a misunderstanding of the word accommodation. He had taken it in its ordinary sense, but he found it was used in an appropriate and technical sense, that is, "if you will adopt my sentiments exactly, I will be so accommodated as never to adopt yours in return." It had been said that this attempt to collect revenue by excises was the first. The gentleman who said this must have forgotten the excise on spirits, which was of much more ancient date. A gentleman from Virginia [Mr. NICHOLS] had said that no opposition was made to impost. Mr. T. was confident the gentleman had not stated with his usual accuracy. There certainly were murmurs against the impost, and, possibly, at the first operation of all taxes, they more or less affect the people unequally; but if you will give them time enough to work their own level, they will become equal, and will systematize in such a manner that the consumer will forever pay. A gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GILES] had complained of some opinions which had been given in the Committee, that a vote on this subject would be a political test, and by each man's vote, his wishes, honestly to pay off the Public Debt, or not, would be discovered. The same gentleman had soon after declared, that all persons who voted to strike out the resolve, would evince a confidence in the virtue of the next Congress, or future Congresses; and that all who voted against striking out, would evince a distrust of the virtue, &c. This declaration Mr. T. thought not so well founded, and not so candid, as the declarations of the gentleman generally were. He asked, if it was a greater evidence of distrust in the virtue of future Legislatures, to suppose they will not repeal a bad act, when found so by experiment, than any thing which can be derived from prolonging an act, for the purpose of giving it a fair chance to be tried by experience; and would it not carry an impeachment on the wisdom of this branch of the Legislature, to leave an act in a situation which will never give it a fair experiment? Mr. T. thought the arguments made use of by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. LYMAN], could not apply; he had argued entirely on the ground that our manufactures should not be taxed at all. If so, why not repeal the whole? The question now is, shall we prolong these taxes a sufficient length of time to discover, by experiment, whether the excise will injure the manufacturer, or shall we not? If, by fair experiment, the excise is found to injure the manufacturer, no man can wish a further continuance; but at least give time enough for that experiment. As to the argument, that all taxes ought to be annual or biennial, Mr. T. said, no man could soberly think that such uncertainty in the mode and duration of taxes could be eligible. Let the people know that a mode of taxation is to be permanent, or at least sufficiently so, to determine its merit by experiment, and they will know how to meet the exaction, and will systematize it; but keep your mode of taxation in uncertainty and fluctuation, and your taxes will be truly oppressive, which no man can wish, unless the new-fangled principle, that, to preserve the liberties of the people, you ought to make them feel most sensibly the inconvenience of paying taxes, should become general; which is in fact saying, it is best for the purpose of securing liberty, peace, and happiness to mankind, for the Legislature so to contrive their mode as to effectually prevent the contrary, and enforce an involuntary payment, and that at a time and in a manner the best calculated to destroy the peace and interrupt the happiness of the person paying. This he thought a fair result of the doctrine which had been mentioned in the Committee, "that direct taxes were preferable to indirect, for the purpose of preserving liberty." Mr. T. said, he should have no great objection to strike out the carriage tax; not that he disliked it; but many persons thought it unconstitutional. He had no doubt on that ground, and believed it would be determined by the Federal Court to be Constitutional; if so, it was agreed on all hands to be a good tax. The resolve must be amended, if it was not struck out; but he conceived, by the rules of the House, if the whole resolution was struck out, that not one of the taxes could be brought forward for a continuance, or, in other words, it would not be in order to move a repeal of the limitation. If he was right in this idea, he hoped no person would vote to strike out the resolution, as he was confident it might be amended, so as to meet the minds of a majority.

Mr. MONTGOMERY.—I am so seriously disposed in favor of the reduction of the Debt, that I rise, at this time, more to give my reasons for the vote I intend to give, than that I believe my arguments will be so clear or convincing, as that I shall have much influence on the opinions of this Committee.

There has been, in the course of investigation, much said on the one hand to show the sufficiency of the existing revenues for the purpose expressed in the resolution; and as much on the other, proving that, without the continuation of the taxes or duties in question, it would be deceptive and very fallacious to attempt the object in view. Without going into the minutiae of calculation on the one side or the other—not, indeed, do I believe it is very important as to the determination of my mind which of the calculations are the most just—it is sufficient for me to observe that the resolution in question, taken in conjunction with a subsequent one, appropriates the whole of the taxes in question, together with the surplus of revenue which may hereafter exist, after satisfying all legal appropriations, to the post-discharge in the first place of the redeemable Debt; and in the next place, to the increase of the Sinking Fund for the purpose of purchasing the residue. Now, it is impossible for me to doubt, but that the Legislature will, at every future period, upon having once established a plan for the reduction of the Debt, abide by the same, till the object is accomplished; and all the revenues, once solemnly pledged for this purpose, will be faithfully applied. If there is no reason to doubt of this, it is very unimportant whether there is a greater or lesser surplus yearly, provided only that there should not be so little as to derange the proposed plan; and that does not seem to be feared by either side; and the greater the yearly surplus, so much the more will the final redemption be accelerated. As to the idea that we may appropriate as much of the present revenues as may be necessary for the purpose of the redemption of the six per cent. stock, as is directed by law, and at the end of two years, if these taxes prove themselves good ones, the House will then, no doubt, continue them; and it is a kind of charge on the virtue of that House to suppose they will not. But, in answer to this, the reduction of the National Debt is a great object, and if ever it is accomplished, it must be the result of a plan. Now the argument for beginning this work without a plan contemplating a permanent revenue, would be just as strong two years hence that we should go on so, as it is now, that we should begin without it; and so on, from one period of two years to another, till the whole was completed. Would any man, or set of men, in their senses, undertake such a mighty task? If such could be found, they would, I believe, be certainly defeated, and the object would never be accomplished; therefore, as I am in earnest about the redemption, I am for a plan the best and most stable that the nature of the case will admit. And I cannot hesitate in approving, for the present, of the one proposed, as it is provided in the resolution, that if other taxes are substituted, the present may at any time be abolished. This I think should satisfy gentlemen who wish to substitute other and direct taxes in the room of those. But I really believe the mode of collecting money from the people by impost duties and excises, provided they are well regulated, are preferable to any direct tax, and the people pay them with greater facility. To illustrate this fact, only suppose that the whole amount of our present revenue was laid on real property, or by direct tax, would it be possible that the people could long bear up under such an enormous burden? I really believe not. Whereas, they now pay it almost insensibly; and I really believe it in a great measure brings its own ability to pay, by stimulating every part of the community to industry and exertion. I would just observe, an idea not so well expressed, which I have touched on before, viz.: that, in the first place, positive provision is hereby proposed to be made for the redemption, yearly, of so much as the law admits, exclusive and previous to any other appropriations which may have any claim on this fund.

Again, as to the necessity of experience with respect to these taxes: If we mean seriously to undertake the redemption of the Debt, what experience do we wish to obtain? Two years will furnish little, and that not so fair an experiment as a longer trial on an established plan; and if we should not like this very well at the end of two years, what then? Try another. Would not that also need two years for an experiment? And so on, till our whole plan would tumble into ruin, and as a nation we should suffer disgrace. For the fact is, having begun, we must not look back; and this or some other tax must be continued till the whole Debt is extinguished; and I really believe, if we adhere to the present plan, the system will, in time, reconcile itself to the people, and our Debt will be paid in a manner by which none will be distressed, and within a time that many of us may reasonably hope to be the living witnesses of.

Thus have I given the reason which shall govern my votes on this occasion as concisely as it is in my power; and I believe I should not even now have trespassed so long on the patience of the Committee, only I am most sincerely and ardently disposed to promote, by every mite of mine, the object proposed; and the more especially so as I believe it will be the last Congress in which I shall ever have the opportunity of giving my sentiments on the question. I submit them to the Committee; they will give them the weight which they merit and no more.

Mr. S. SMITH.—I agree with the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. W. SMITH,] that the subject before you is of no great importance—no less than the continuing of a system by which you are to establish excises on the growing manufactures of the Union. It is not the two cents per pound on sugar, nor the eight cents on snuff, but the principle we combat. We are told those are luxuries. The same insidious policy was pursued by Great Britain. It was not the trifling duty on tea, (a luxury,) but the principle of taxation that united America successfully to oppose her.

The same gentleman has said, why should not refined sugar pay duty, when salt, coffee, &c., pay? This kind of argument is seldom used by that gentleman; it is merely ad captandum vulgus, for he well knows that every pound of refined sugar that is consumed has already paid a duty of at least three cents per pound on the raw material.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. SENDWICK] has said, that we must either continue those taxes or lay a direct tax. This argument is meant merely to deceive, for he cannot believe the continuing those taxes necessary to the object in question. He must know that the revenues independent of those taxes are fully adequate. Nay, sir, so certain am I on this subject, that I would vote against any motion for a land tax; it being in my opinion wholly unnecessary.

The gentleman says, that the mistakes in all the statements made by the members of this House have been palpable, and that he will rest his confidence implicitly on the Report of the late Secretary. We are not accountable for the mistakes of others. They were indeed palpable. The Secretary has proved some of ours. I stated the revenue which would arise from additional duties at $750,000. The Secretary says that they will be $769,000, but he deducts therefrom ten per cent. for drawbacks and expenses. There he is wrong. The drawbacks, &c., in 1792, (the year he calculates on,) were but six per cent. And the additional duties being principally on dry goods, of which a trifle is exported, he ought not to have charged more than two per cent. for drawbacks and expenses, which would have confirmed my statement of $750,000. Having observed this mistake, I was led to examine more minutely, and I thought I could discover other errors. For instance, in the result marked F, for 1793, the drawback is estimated at $1,500,000, when already there had been charged thereon $279,000. This is $500,000 more than heretofore calculated on, and that much more than will probably arise on that year. The Civil List is charged with $117,000 more than any year has actually cost; the Military at $29,000 more than it cost in 1793, and no person can suppose that our Military expenses will increase. Nay, some contemplate a reduction.

My habits have been to examine, and I am certain that the late Secretary (for whose abilities as well as personal character I have the greatest respect) will pardon my having pointed out what I conceive to be errors. Those sums, together with $65,000 over-charged for drawbacks on additional duties, will make $781,000. Deduct therefrom $380,000 supposed to be raised by the new duties, and there will remain $401,000 for contingencies, and for purchase of the Debt. I have not taken into calculation the surplus made by the Secretary of $142,000, in his result F, because I do believe that nearly the whole of that will be lost in the estimate of $400,000 expected from the excise on domestic distilled spirits. My calculation makes that item (which has always been estimated at $400,000) to yield less than $300,000 to the Treasury.

I shall not pretend to follow the gentleman from Connecticut through that vein of ridicule that he has thrown on the memorialists. They are citizens, had a right to petition, and deserve to be treated with decency—they ask a redress of grievances, nor that of the House—they ask a redress of grievances. He has said we want experience on those laws, but we may test them by the existing excise. It was by it I meant to test the new excise, but the report demanded thereon has not yet been made, and I must risk my calculation, which I firmly believe in myself.

In 1792, the net amount of duties of excise paid to the Treasury, all expenses of collection deducted was - - - $383,209

Deduct drawbacks paid by the Collectors of Customs on exportation - - - $136,428

With $75 for molasses - - - 27,253

----- 109,143

----- $274,066

Leaving an actual net revenue of $274,066 for the year 1792.

The returns for 1793 are not complete, but add to those made, a like sum for each of the States that have returned their accounts to those for 1792, and you will find that you lose between the years 1792 and 1793, nearly one hundred thousand dollars—a prodigious decrease for one year. Should that excise continue thus to decrease, you must find funds to pay the officers from some other revenue.

In the year 1792, the spirit from molasses produced $174,152; from grain and fruit, $72,170. To collect that from molasses requires not more than twenty persons. To collect the residue, about two hundred and thirty officers. Supposing other States have officers equal to the number in Maryland, where twenty-five are employed to collect a net revenue of $15,591. Why, sir, if the whole was divided among the officers, it would not be too much for their services. Thus have you, at least, two hundred and thirty officers spread over the whole face of America, to pay the immense sum of seventy-two thousand dollars per annum to the Treasury. The State of Virginia paid of net revenue, in 1792, from the excise, $15,186; the cost of collection is charged at $5,258—so that twenty shillings collected from the people pays but fifteen shillings to the Treasury, and yet the officers are not half paid. Those of Maryland must resign, unless their pay is increased, for, on an average, they receive but about seventy-five dollars per annum. I agree with the gentleman that the people pay taxes by excise more pleasantly than by direct taxation. But, sir, I believe the temper of our people is not prepared for a general excise system; that excises cannot be collected without an host of officers, who, being paid as they ought to be, would swallow up the revenue. Whence arises this decrease? From the gradual increase on domestic distilled spirits. My calculation

corruption of the morals of the people, occasioned by the excise system.

One other observation: I do not think with those who would throw three millions of dollars into market annually for the purchase of the Debt. If you do, you will raise the price so that your three millions would not purchase more than two millions four hundred thousand dollars.

A sum of from five hundred thousand to one million annually, will not affect the market so materially, and will, perhaps, be purchased nearly at par; and that sum will be paid from your existing revenues without the aid of the taxes in question.

Mr. FINDLEY observed, that the real ground of controversy was within such narrow limits, that, if foreign matter had not been introduced, he had not designed to detain the Committee with his observations. The question was only, whether those revenue laws which were, by their own limitation, to continue for two years longer, should now be extended to six years.

After the wide field of argument that had been taken, he wished to call the attention of the Committee back to the single ground of controversy; he thought the best way to do this, was to state a concise narrative of the progress of excises under this Government.

In the year 1790, a law was enacted for levying an excise on distilled spirits and stills. At that time we had very little practical knowledge of excises; in most States they were only known by the odium of the name; in some others they were only known by being defeated. In the Spring of 1791, the Secretary of the Treasury was directed to report early to the next session the progress of the excise law; the next session passed without this information being given: the direction was renewed, and a day named on which the report should be made. This produced the report of the first day of January in the last session, which proved that the excise law was very partially executed, notwithstanding the amendments which had been made to that law, and the suggestions that it was in full operation. From this report it was evident that the revenue fell much below the estimated amount, notwithstanding that the expense of collection was increased almost every session, and that, in some districts, the revenue did not pay that expense.

While such a view of this excise was before the House, the present revenue Loans were introduced, and supported by arguments drawn from theory or the experience of countries otherwise circumstanced than we were. Being opposed by a pretence of large minority, and the estimates of their produce not being supported by any sufficient data, a limitation of their duration was agreed to unanimously.

One gentleman, indeed, [Mr. TRACY.] says that he, at that time, disapproved of the limitation, though he voted for it; and, from this circumstance, he justifies his right of voting against it now. This manner of arguing affords a much stronger proof of that gentleman's ingenuity than of his candor. He complains that voting for the limitation procured no votes in favor of these laws. This, at least, proves that the limitation was the only thing in which the House was unanimous, and, consequently, that this being the most respectable part of those laws, ought to be held most sacred.

The same gentleman, in his last discourse, thought proper to select Pennsylvania as the peculiar object of his censure, and to make severe animadversions on the conduct of her merchants and manufacturers. Had he confined his censure to the part of this State, where a criminal opposition to the excise law actually happened, and had this been a Court of Censors, authorized to make a scrutiny into the character of particular States, and hold them up to public contempt, perhaps I might have acknowledged the justice of his strictures with respect to some of my immediate constituents; but would still have gloried in being a citizen of Pennsylvania. Nor do I think myself dishonored by the unfortunate misconduct of some nearer where I reside. When a comparative scrutiny is made of the character of the merchants and manufacturers of other commercial and manufacturing States, I am confident, with the exceptions I mentioned, that Pennsylvania will not shrink from the trial, nor blush at the result; but as this House is no Council of Censors nor Court of Judicature, every thing of this kind is disorderly and impolitic.

Mr. F. observed, that a gentleman, yesterday, [Mr. SARGENT.] had done him the honor to make some remarks on what he had formerly said on this subject, respecting the faith of the Government. He supposed he had not then expressed himself with sufficient accuracy, but would now explain his meaning. He did not mean that the faith of Government was so pledged as that it should be suffered to expire at the time to which it stands limited, or, that it could not be extended with propriety, as soon as experience of the revenue it would produce, and its effects on the manufacturers, would justify the measure. He only contended, that a limitation thus unanimously agreed to, should not be extended until we were possessed of the practical information intended to be obtained. He said, this was reasonably expected by those who doubted of the propriety of the law, and by the manufacturers who were affected by it; and no man had pretended to say that this information was yet obtained.

He said that the manufacturers were so confident in this expectation, that though, through the impropriety of the law, some of the manufacturers had their business totally stopped; they had made no complaint, until we obliged them to come forward by attempting to extend the limitation, and by construing their silence into approbation. He said he had the honor to be one of a committee of seven, to examine and report on the memorials of the manufacturers. It appeared to that committee, on the most exact scrutiny, that the manufacturers could not hitherto add the tax to the price, and that the revenues fell much below the estimate; but the laws having been but a few months in operation, they thought it possible, that these circumstances might be owing to temporary and incidental causes, and therefore, though they voted against the repeal of these laws, yet they reported, with only one dissenting voice, against extending the limitation.

The importance of rendering the revenue permanent on which the discharge of the Public Debt is to depend, affords the only good argument that has been offered for extending the limitation, and this circumstance has considerable weight; but, as it is not proposed to lessen the revenue, it will still be in the power of Congress to extend those revenues, and add others of the same kind, if experience justifies the measure, and if those taxes are judged improper, there are other resources. However, it is not necessary to appropriate this revenue to the discharge of the Debt; much more revenue than these sources will produce are necessary for the support of the Army and other temporary purposes.

The gentlemen in support of the measure, with great confidence, assert the decision of this measure to be a criterion of a disposition to discharge the Public Debt; but this assertion is neither candid nor well founded. The amount of revenue is too small, and the principle too exceptionable, to be made such a test. If it is a test of anything, it is of the jealousy we entertain of the future Legislature. Such a jealousy, though pretty evident, he thought, was unfounded. He believed that those who came after us, would possess as much virtue and discernment as we did, and would be as much interested in providing for an honest discharge of the Debt.

We have been frequently called on to bring forward direct taxes or other substitutes, and were charged with voting against direct taxes last session. There is no need for other taxes until the limitation is nearer its expiration; nor ought this to be called for unless we were proposing a repeal of some of the existing taxes, as they are fully sufficient for the object proposed.

Mr. F. said that, as direct taxes had been often mentioned in such a manner as to suggest a suspicion that he did not seriously wish them to be brought forward at any time, he begged leave to explain himself on that subject more fully. He said that, last session, he had the honor of making the motion for the Committee of Ways and Means, and it was his wish that that committee would have proposed a direct tax of two millions of dollars, to be apportioned among the different States, agreeably to the Constitution, and appropriated for a limited time to the redemption of the Public Debt. He expected that each State would levy it in its own way.

He said that, however much he was against an excise system of taxation, because of its partial operation and corrupting effects; yet, on reflecting that even a direct tax could not be apportioned with perfect equality on all the States, and that it would generally happen, that where the indirect taxes pressed lightest, the direct taxes would press most heavily, he thought it would be best now, when the country was able to bear it, to put both kinds into operation, and this might be aided with further duties on such manufactures as could bear it, and equally enjoyed the benefit of protecting duties with those already taxed. He hoped that, when the next Congress met, such a plan of taxation would be adopted; doing this, would be an unequivocal test of a disposition to promote a speedy and honest discharge of the Public Debt.

The tax negated last session, was not such a direct one as he contemplated, nor of sufficient amount to be worth the expense of levying; nor was it needed for the object proposed. It was but five hundred thousand dollars, and to be levied exclusively on land. The direct tax, he contemplated, was a tax on all visible property that could be conveniently rated, and he conceived that two millions of dollars, would be but a moderate tax on the United States.

He did not think it necessary to take much notice of the arguments offered respecting the quality of the taxes, as we were neither about to originate nor repeal them, but thought many of these arguments more plausible than solid. He instanced a gentleman's [Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina] comparison of the impost on coffee, with the excise on loaf sugar. If the gentleman had reflected, that coarse sugar paid an impost before it was refined, as well as coffee, he would have been convinced that the comparison was fallacious. To make them correspond, there ought to be an excise on coffee when it is boiled, or, rather, on the grinding of it, as in England.

The same gentleman expressed himself surprised at the objections to the swearing required in the excise laws, and said an honest man who was willing to do his duty, could have no objection to swearing. Mr. F. said, that this case was strongly misstated. The honest man was not afraid of his own swearing falsely, but he was afraid that his honesty would ruin his business, because the man that did not fear an oath would undersell him. This was an evil which the most judicious advocates of excises acknowledged to be inseparable from them. The experience of every country, where an excise system prevails, has produced lamentable instances of the depravity of those that were immediately connected with the excises. He regretted that, already, instances of such depravity could be found in our own country. But the gentleman who had just sat down [Mr. S. SMITH.] had spoken so well on this subject, and on the sentiments of the people respecting excises, that it was not necessary for him to add much on that subject. One particular, however, he would mention. It was in proof before a committee of which he was a member, that, notwithstanding the protecting duties, all the rum distilleries in this city and Baltimore, had given up the business, but one in each of these towns, though, before the excise law, these distilleries had been worth from a thousand to twelve hundred pounds annually to the owners. They now either lie idle, or are turned into breweries. He did not know how it was in other towns, nor whether the two distillers that continued at the business in this city and Baltimore, were honest men or not; but he thought the circumstance was alarming, and ought to be inquired into.

The same gentleman spoke much about the propriety of taxing luxuries, as they were only used by the wealthy. He said he never had heard an exact definition of luxuries. In general, they were such things as contributed to the happiness of individuals, at least in their own esteem, and which they could exist without the use of; but to take them by this rule, they would be exceedingly numerous, and as various as the different tastes, passions, and circumstances of mankind. With respect to loaf sugar, it was in pretty general use; and as to snuff, he never knew the consumption of it to be confined to the wealthy. He thought a view of this House gave a proof that it was not, but few of the members used it; it was more commonly used by the poor, the disconsolate and unhappy, who had recourse to it as a stimulant to assist in supporting them under melancholy. He said, there was another kind of property, which, if not luxury, yet could well bear a tax—the neat great landed estates. Many might be found with extensive manors of land, numerous stocks of cattle, and abundance of all the most permanent kinds of wealth, who did not pay as much of impost or excise as the day laborer, or the man who had to rent a farm to raise his family on.

Mr. GILES hoped that some of the taxes would be continued. His opinion had uniformly been, that the taxes, altogether, were insufficient for any formidable operation on the National Debt. The surplus of revenue, by the most favorable statement, was not supposed to be more than three hundred thousand dollars per annum. He did not think the excise system the best for making an impression on the Debt. He wished for an apportionment among the States. As to the resolution before the House, he approved of some of the taxes, and others he disapproved. He therefore wished the resolution could be divided, that he might not be obliged to vote for or against five taxes all at once. He hoped that a plan for apportioning taxes to discharge the Debt would, before the rise of the session, be laid on the table. If it was not done by somebody else, he would do it himself. He had strong objections to several of these taxes, to which he would give his consent, rather than that nothing should be done. He wished that some better proposition could be brought forward than a few petty excises. Such a thing might be laid on the table, and, between this and the next session, they could sound their constituents upon it. He wished for some modification in the notion of Mr. S. SMITH.

Mr. KITTEBA was for a division immediately. Mr. DAYTON, Mr. PAGE, Mr. FITZSIMONS, Mr. MADISON, and Mr. HARTLEY, also spoke.

The last gentleman feared that he would never see an end of such a discussion. The question for striking out the resolution was put—Ayes only 21.

The motion being thus lost: Mr. GILES said that, at the risk of popular odium, he would move to strike out the tax upon carriages. He knew this to be the most popular of the taxes, but he believed it to be against the Constitution. It was not a voluntary, but a compulsory tax. To lay a tax on a thing already in a man's possession, was a direct tax; and, though a popular one, the fear of giving offence would not deter him from doing what he believed to be his duty. A gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. W. SMITH] had treated objections of this kind lightly; and had said, that the Constitution could be corrected. He thought this a very unguarded mode of expression. We have all sworn to support the Constitution; and, if it must be altered, we know very well that this House has not authority for that purpose. There must be an authority of a different kind. As to the tax now before the House, so firmly were several gentlemen persuaded of its illegality, that they had determined to make an opposition to it—not as in Pennsylvania, by an insurrection—but by a trial before a Court of Law.

Mr. BOUNDINOT considered the objections of Mr. GILES as totally groundless. You might as well say that the tonnage of a ship is a direct tax, for the ship and the carriage have both, perhaps, been in possession of their respective owners, before the existence of the tax. If he had imagined the tax to be unconstitutional, he would certainly have opposed it with all his might. He considered it as a popular tax.

Mr. HILLHOUSE recommended brevity and despatch.

Mr. BEATTY wondered at hearing his colleague say, that the carriage tax was popular, since it was quite otherwise among their constituents in New Jersey.

Mr. BOUNDINOT explained.—That part of the tax which regarded carriages of pleasure was popular; but the collector of the tax in New Jersey, by a construction which never came into the head of anybody except himself, applied the law to the wagons of farmers going to market. This part of the tax was very unpopular, and justly so, but the other part was agreeable.

On dividing, the motion of Mr. GILES was negatived—Ayes 29, noes 55.

A motion was made, by Mr. SEDGWICK, for striking out another part of the resolution. The meaning was not to limit the appropriation of the produce of these taxes to the discharge of the Debt exclusively. He had been appointed on a committee, when the galleries were shut; and it was the business of the House to provide money for the humane and national purposes referred to. That money must be had. He did not think himself at liberty to speak more plainly, but the House knew that this was an indispensable object.

Mr. FITZSIMONS said that, if the gentleman meant any other purpose than what had been all along professed, for the application of the money, he wished him to speak out.

The Committee agreed to all the resolutions as reported, and then rose, and the House agreed to the resolutions, which are as follows:

1. Resolved, That there be appropriated, out of the revenues of the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-five, a sum not exceeding six hundred thousand dollars, to be applied to the payment of two dollars on every hundred dollars of the amount of that part of the Public Debt, which bears an actual interest of six per cent.; the said payment to be made on the — day of — next.

2. Resolved, That the several clauses of limitation in the acts for laying duties and taxes on manufactured sugar and snuff; on licenses for retailing wines and spirituous liquors; on sales at auction; and on carriages, be repealed; that the said several acts be continued in force until the year one thousand eight hundred and one; and that the moneys arising therefrom be appropriated to the discharge of that portion of the Public Debt which is redeemable by law, subject, however, to a substitution of other duties or taxes of equal value, to all or any of the said duties and taxes.

3. Resolved, That the eighth section of the act of last session, laying and continuing certain duties on goods, wares, and merchandise, be repealed; and that the duration of the said act be made commensurate with the act for laying such duties, passed the tenth day of August, one thousand seven hundred and ninety, entitled "An act making further provision for the Debt of the United States."

4. Resolved, That the surplus of revenue, which may hereafter exist, after satisfying all legal appropriations, be annually appropriated to the purchase of the Public Debt.

5. Resolved, That provision be made for the sale of the public lands in the Western Territory.

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in pursuant to the said resolutions, and that Mr. WILLIAM SMITH, Mr. AMES, Mr. FITZSIMONS, Mr. DUNN, and Mr. NICHOLAS, do prepare and bring in the same.

MONDAY, February 9.

ROBERT GOODLOE HARPER, returned to serve in this House as a member for the State of South Carolina, in the room of ALEXANDER GILLOX, deceased, appeared, produced his credentials, was qualified, and took his seat in the House.

Mr. GOODHUE, from the committee to whom was referred the memorial of sundry manufacturers of hemp, in the towns of Boston, Newport, and Providence, made a report; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act to amend the act, entitled 'An act to establish the Post Office and Post Roads within the United States;' and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported several amendments thereto; which were severally twice read, and agreed to by the House.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendments, be read a third time to-morrow.

Mr. SEDGWICK, from the Committee to whom was referred the Message from the President of the United States of the 4th instant, enclosing a Letter from the Secretary of State relative to a Loan for the maintenance of the intercourse of the United States with foreign nations, made a report, which was read: Whereupon,

Resolved, That adequate provision be made by law for reimbursing, before the year —, any loan which may hereafter be made under the authority of the President of the United States, in virtue of an act of the last session of Congress, entitled "An act making further provisions for the expenses attending the intercourse of the United States with foreign nations; and further to continue in force the act, entitled 'An act providing the means of intercourse between the United States and foreign nations.'"

Resolved, That, for the purpose mentioned in the foregoing resolutions, the proceeds of the duties upon carriages for the conveyance of persons, on licenses for selling wines and foreign distilled spirituous liquors by retail, on snuff and refined sugar, and on property sold at auction, imposed by acts passed at the last session of Congress, and which may be further continued the present session, which are not already appropriated, be appropriated for the reimbursement, before the year —, of any loan which may hereafter be made in virtue of the act aforesaid; and that the faith of Government be pledged to make good any deficiency.

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in pursuant to the said resolutions; and that Mr. SEDGWICK, Mr. MADISON, Mr. BALDWIN, Mr. WILLIAM SMITH, and Mr. GILES, do prepare and bring in the same.

Ordered, That a committee be appointed to prepare and bring in a bill to amend the act passed the 8th day of May, 1792, entitled "An act making alterations in the Treasury and War Departments," in such manner as to give the President of the United States the same power of temporary appointments to the offices mentioned in the eighth section of the act aforesaid, in case of vacancy, as by the same section is given to him in the cases of death, absence from the Seat of Government, and sickness: Provided, That no appointment, made as aforesaid, shall be for a longer term than six months.

And a committee was appointed of Mr. SEDGWICK, Mr. WATTS, and Mr. McDOWELL.

The House proceeded to consider the resolutions, reported on the 4th instant, from the Committee of the Whole to whom was referred the report of the committee respecting the settlement of the accounts of the former Government, and the unpaid balances due thereon; and the said resolutions being amended, were agreed to by the House as follows:

1. Resolved, That further and more adequate provision should be made, by law, for the recovery of debts due from individuals to the United States.

2. Resolved, That the Comptroller of the Treasury be authorized to issue a notification to any person who has received moneys for which he is accountable to the United States, or to the executor or administrator of such person, if he be deceased, requiring him to render to the Auditor of the Treasury, in a reasonable time, not less than —, nor more than — months, all his accounts and vouchers for the expenditure of the said moneys, comprehending a schedule of all claims of credit, or, in default thereof, to remain charged with the moneys so advanced; and suits shall be commenced for the same without further notice, and the party subjected to the costs and charges of such suits, whether the ultimate decision shall be in their favor or against them.

3. Resolved, That the Marshals of the respective Districts be authorized to serve the said notifications on the parties therein named, by leaving copies thereof at their respective dwellings or usual places of abode; and that the return of the notifications to the Comptroller's Office, with the Marshal's certificate thereon, that service has been made, be deemed legal evidence in the District Courts of the proceedings, and for the recovery of costs and charges.

4. Resolved, That, in cases where accounts shall be rendered to the Auditor of the Treasury, within the time limited in the notifications to the Auditor, he shall immediately proceed to liquidate the credits to be passed for the said accounts, and report the same to the Comptroller, with a particular list of any claims for credit which shall have been disallowed by him.

5. Resolved, That the Comptroller of the Treasury immediately proceed to the examination of the credits allowed by the Auditor, and, if the same be approved by him, that he cause credit therefor to be passed on the public books.

6. Resolved, That a list of such credits as shall have been claimed and not admitted by the Comptroller, be made out and transmitted to the Marshal of the District where the claimant resides, and that a copy thereof be left at the dwelling or last usual place of abode of such claimant, with notice of the time assigned by the Comptroller for the final hearing of the account; of which proceedings the Marshal to transmit an official return to the Comptroller.

7. Resolved, In case of an omission or neglect on the part of the claimant to assign reasons, in writing, to the Comptroller, within the time limited, why the suspended credits should be admitted, all future claims therefor to be barred.

8. Resolved, In case the claimant assign, in writing, his reason why the suspended credits should be admitted, the Comptroller to be directed to consider the same, and decide thereon, according to principles of equity and the usages of the Treasury Department.

9. Resolved, In cases where the final decision of the Comptroller shall have been against the claimant, and where he shall have voluntarily, within — months, submitted his claim to the equitable decision of the Secretary of State, the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Attorney General, the said officers to be vested with authority to hear the claimant and pronounce an award, which shall be final and conclusive to all concerned.

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in pursuant to the said resolutions; and that Mr. HEATH, Mr. LYMAN, Mr. FINDLEY, Mr. BALDWIN, and Mr. HARRISON, do prepare and bring in the same.

Mr. SEDGWICK, from the committee appointed, presented a bill to amend the act, entitled "An act making alterations in the Treasury and War Departments;" which was read twice, and committed.

Mr. BOGDANOT, from the committee appointed to examine and report on the state of the Mint, and what further measures are necessary to render the institution more beneficial, made a report; which was read, and ordered to be committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday next.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill, entitled "An act supplementary to the act, entitled 'An act for enrolling and licensing ships or vessels to be employed in the coasting trade and fisheries, and for regulating the same,'" with several amendments; to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

An engrossed bill to amend the act, entitled "An act making alterations in the Treasury and War Departments," was read the third time, and passed.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the report of a plan for the reduction of the Public Debt; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported progress.

TUESDAY, February 10.

The bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act to amend the act, entitled 'An act to establish the Post Office and Post Roads within the United States,'" together with the amendments agreed to yesterday, was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. W. SMITH, from the committee appointed, presented a bill to amend an act "laying certain duties upon snuff and refined sugar," which was read twice, and committed.

A message from the Senate informed the House, that the Senate have passed the bill, entitled "An act relative to the compensations to certain officers employed in the collection of the duties of impost and tonnage," with several amendments; to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

The House proceeded to consider the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act supplementary to the act, entitled 'An act for enrolling and licensing ships or vessels to be employed in the coasting trade and fisheries, and for regulating the same,'" Whereupon, Ordered, That the said amendments be committed to Mr. GOODRICH, Mr. GILES, and Mr. W. SMITH.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the report of a plan for the reduction of the Public Debt; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose, and reported progress.

WEDNESDAY, February 11.

Mr. HEATH, from the committee appointed, presented a bill for the more effectual recovery of debts due from individuals to the United States; which was read twice, and committed.

The House proceeded to consider the amendment proposed by the Senate to the bill entitled "An act relative to the compensations of certain officers employed in the collection of the duties of impost and tonnage;" and, the same being read, was agreed to.

Mr. SEDGWICK, from the committee appointed, presented a bill for the reimbursement of a Loan authorized by an act of the last session of Congress; which was read twice and committed.

Mr. GOODRICH, from the committee to whom were committed the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act supplementary to the act, entitled 'An act for enrolling and licensing ships or vessels to be employed in the coasting trade and fisheries, and for regulating the same,'" made a report; which was read: Whereupon,

Resolved, That this House doth disagree to all the said amendments.

Resolved, That a conference be desired with the Senate on the subject-matter of the said amendments; and that Mr. GOODRICH, Mr. GILES, and Mr. W. SMITH, be appointed managers at the said conference on the part of this House.

Mr. JEREMIAH SMITH, from the committee to whom was referred the petition of sundry owners of fishing vessels in the towns of Portland and Falmouth, in the State of Massachusetts, made a report; which was read, and ordered to be committed to a Committee of the Whole House tomorrow.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the report of a plan for the reduction of the Public Debt; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported several resolutions to the House: where the same were twice read, amended, and agreed to, as follows:

1. Resolved, That provision be made by law for the payment of interest on the principal of the unsubscribed Debt of the United States, (except Loan Office certificates, bearing interest on their nominal value,) at the rate of six per cent. per annum, for one year, ending the thirty-first day of December, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-five.

2. Resolved, That the arrears of interest on the unsubscribed Debt aforesaid, be calculated to the end of the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-five, and that the possessors thereof be entitled to subscribe the same, on loan, to the United States, at an interest of three per cent. per annum. That those who shall not so subscribe, shall receive, on the first day of January, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-six, one-tenth part of the said arrears to them respectively due.

3. Resolved, That the holders of Loan Office certificates, which bear interest on their nominal value, be entitled to receive the specie value, together with the interest thereon, at the Treasury of the United States, on demand; but that no interest shall accrue on such certificates after the — day of —.

4. Resolved, That a Loan be opened at the Treasury of the United States to the amount of the whole of the Foreign Debt; and, that for every one hundred dollars of the said Debt subscribed thereto, the subscriber shall be entitled to an addition of one-half of a per centum to the rate of interest to which such stock is now entitled, or to a sum equivalent in capital, bearing an interest of five per cent. per annum. And that the permanent revenues of the United States be pledged for the payment of the interest quarter yearly, at the Treasury of the United States, till the reimbursement of the principal.

5. Resolved, That the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund be empowered, with the approbation of the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, to provide, by new loans, or by the sale of certificates of stock, bearing an interest of six per centum, for the reimbursement of any installment or part of the present foreign Debt of the United States: Provided, That the principal and interest of such loan and certificates shall be payable at the Treasury of the United States, and the principal thereof redeemable at the Treasury of the United States; and that such conversion of foreign into domestic Debt, shall not charge the United States with an interest of more than half a per cent. in addition to that payable on the Debt so converted. That the interest of the sum redeemed and paid thereof, and the permanent revenue of the United States, be pledged for the payment of the interest on the loans to be made on the stock to be created in virtue of the said powers.

6. Resolved, That in addition to the provisions heretofore made for reimbursing and redeeming the Debt of the United States, so much of the fourth section of the act, entitled "An act making provision for the reduction of the Public Debt," as makes a reservation out of the interest on the Debt purchased, be repealed; and, that in lieu thereof a sufficient sum of the duties on impost and tonnage be appropriated for that purpose.

7. Resolved, That so much of the revenue arising from the duties on imports and tonnage, as, together with the other moneys now constituting the Sinking Fund, that shall accrue to it by virtue of the foregoing provisions, and the interest re-deemed, as shall be sufficient, be appropriated towards the payment of the sum which may of right be annually paid on account of the principal of such funded stock as, on the first day of January, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-six, shall bear an interest of six per cent. per annum, excluding that to the credit of the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund, and that which shall stand to the credit of particular States. And that the same shall continue so appropriated until the whole of the said stock shall be redeemed; and, thenceforth, until the whole of the Debt of the United States, funded and unfunded, shall be discharged.

8. Resolved, That the dividends in the stock (the property of the United States) in the Bank of the United States be appropriated to the same fund, reserving thereout, from time to time, so much as shall be necessary to discharge the interest on what shall remain unpaid of the Loan made of the said Bank, pursuant to the eleventh section of the act of incorporation, with so much of the duties on imports and tonnage as, together with those dividends, (after deducting what may be necessary to pay the interest,) shall be sufficient to pay off the instalments of the said Loan, as they shall hereafter, from year to year, become due; and as, (the said instalments being first paid,) together with any other moneys which, on the first day of January, one thousand eight hundred and two, may belong to the said fund, and not otherwise appropriated, shall be sufficient, from year to year, with the interest redeemed, to pay the sums which may of right be annually paid, on account of the principal of such funded stock as, at the end of the year one thousand eight hundred, shall begin to bear an interest of six per cent., excluding that which may stand to the credit of the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund, and that to the credit of individual States; and continue so appropriated until the said last-mentioned stock, and the instalments of the Loan aforesaid, shall be redeemed and discharged, and the interest of the stock which shall be redeemed by virtue of the foregoing provisions continue to be appropriated to the said fund after the full redemption in such case is completed, until the whole of the present Debt of the United States be redeemed by reimbursement, purchase, or otherwise.

9. Resolved, That the moneys arising from the sales of the lands of the United States, and such as shall be received for debts due to the United States antecedent to the present Government, together with the surplus of all current revenues which shall remain unappropriated at the end of any year, be carried to the credit of the same fund.

10. Resolved, That, after the last day of December next, all reimbursements of the capital of the Debt of the United States (foreign or domestic,) and of the reimbursement of the Loan had of the Bank of the United States, be made under the superintendence of the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund; and that they be empowered, with the approbation of the President of the United States, as the instalments of principal become due, to borrow the sums necessary to pay such instalment: Provided, That every such loan shall be redeemable at the pleasure of the United States, and the rate of interest shall not exceed six per centum per annum, and be chargeable—

First. Upon the interest of the instalment which shall be reimbursed;

Secondly. Upon the revenue of impost and tonnage, for making good any deficiency.

But the interest on the six per cent stock redeemed shall not be included.

11. Resolved, That the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund be authorized, with the approbation of the President, to borrow, from time to time, such sums, in anticipation of the revenue appropriated, as may be necessary for the payment of the interest on the Public Debt, not exceeding one million in any year, and reimbursable within a year from the time of each Loan; and that the interest on such Loan be defrayed out of the permanent revenue, and shall not exceed six per centum per annum.

12. Resolved, That all sums remaining unexpended, after the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-five, upon any appropriation for more than two years, after the end of the year for which such appropriation may be made, shall be carried to a separate account to be kept at the Treasury; and that a statement of all appropriations shall be reported to the Legislature within thirty days after their first meeting in every year.

13. Resolved, That all priorities established by appropriations for the Funded Debt, shall, after the last day of December, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-six, cease with respect to all the creditors of the United States, who shall not, before the said last day of December, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-six, signify their dissent thereto to the Comptroller of the Treasury; and that, after that period, the revenue charged with such appropriations shall constitute a common fund, chargeable with the same debts indiscriminately, excepting only as it may respect such of the creditors as may signify their dissent thereto, in manner aforesaid.

14. Resolved, That all Loan Office certificates, final settlements, or indents of interest, now in the hands of any person or persons, shall, on or before the — day of —, be exhibited at the Treasury, where the holders or possessors shall be entitled to receive other certificates of equivalent tenor, in lieu thereof; and if any person shall neglect to exhibit such Loan Office certificates, final settlements, or indents of interest, and to get the same exchanged, he or they shall be forever barred from any payment or acknowledgment for such Loan Office certificate, final settlement, or indent of interest.

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in pursuant to the said resolutions; and that Mr. WILLIAM SMITH, Mr. AMES, Mr. FRIZZMONS, Mr. DUVAL, and Mr. NICHOLAS, do prepare and bring in the same.

Mr. DAYTON, from the committee appointed, presented a bill for continuing and regulating the Military Establishment of the United States, and for repealing sundry acts heretofore passed on that subject; which was read twice, and committed.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill for the reimbursement of a Loan authorized by the act of the last session of Congress; and after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported the bill without amendment.

Ordered, That the said bill be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

TAX ON CARRIAGES.

It was moved by Mr. BEATTY, that a committee should be appointed to report whether any, and what alterations are necessary in the act for laying a tax on carriages for pleasure, and to report a bill, with such alterations as may be necessary in the same. Agreed to.

On this occasion, Mr. BEATTY observed, that he had, some few days ago, when the resolution for extending the time of limitation to certain excise acts passed last session, was under consideration, contradicted what fell from his colleague, [Mr. BORDINOT], that the law "laying duties upon carriages" was popular in the State of New Jersey. It was (said Mr. B.) the very reverse of that, and, of consequence, he could, by no means, assent to the prolongation of that act to the year 1801. The House having, however, agreed to the extension of this act to a distant period, he now thought it was a duty he owed to his constituents to bring forward a proposition for the revision of that law. This he was now desirous of submitting, and he repeated that the act in question was generally disliked by the citizens of the State from whence he came; and, in some parts, it was so obnoxious, that, were it not for the patriotism and love of order which his constituents had at all times manifested in their conduct, he would not have been answerable that the duties arising under that law could have been collected. He was ready, however, to admit, that great part of the dissatisfaction had arisen from the injudicious mode of execution adopted by the Supervisor, who had, perhaps, discovered more zeal than understanding in the construction of this law.

Mr. B. had no great objection to the principle of the law, but he thought it was defective in two points, and was susceptible of amendment, so as to render it more agreeable to his constituents. The enacting clause is not sufficiently minute in the description of the carriages subject to taxation, and, in some instances, the terms used were of an equivocal nature. To prove the first, he need only mention that, notwithstanding the protection afforded by the proviso, in the first section, to carriages for "domestic purposes," yet the market wagons of New Jersey had pretty generally been subjected to the duty; and, as an instance of the second, he said that the term "coach," used in the law, appears to have no appropriate meaning. Before the passing of this law, he had reason to believe that three-fourths of the carriages in use in this city were of this description; and now, it seems, by some new definition of the law, that not one in four are of that species of carriage, but are returned to the Collector and pay a tax only of two dollars, on the same scale with the market wagons of New Jersey. But the law (Mr. B. observed) was materially defective in another point. In cases of doubt, what carriages are within the exempting description, there is no summary mode of determining—what carriages are "usually" and "chiefly" employed in husbandry," but every disputed case must be the subject of a suit in all the legal forms. This was highly objectionable, both on the grounds of delay and expense, and had no doubt occasioned the payment of the tax, in a variety of instances, where the parties were conscious they were within the exempting clause, but had preferred to pay the two dollars rather than to contend with the Collector in a suit at law. He hoped, therefore, the House would readily agree to remedy these defects, and would appoint a committee for that purpose.

And a committee was appointed of Mr. BEATTY, Mr. NEW, and Mr. HILLHOUSE. And the House adjourned.

THURSDAY, February 12.

An engrossed bill for the reimbursement of a Loan authorized by an act of the last session of Congress was read the third time, and passed. The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the report of the Committee to whom were referred the laws of the Territory of the United States Northwest of the river Ohio, passed the first day of August, 1792; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported a resolution thereupon; which was twice read, amended, and agreed to by the House, as follows:

Resolved, That all the laws passed by the Secretary and Judges of the Territory of the United States Northwest of the river Ohio, on the first day of August, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-two, be disapproved, excepting a law, entitled "An act to repeal certain parts of an act, entitled 'An act creating the office of Clerk of the Legislature.'"

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in pursuant to the said resolution; and that Mr. FINDLAY, Mr. GREENUP, Mr. HUNTER, Mr. McDOWELL, and Mr. COIT, do prepare and bring in the same.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill, entitled "An act supplementary to the act concerning invalids," with several amendments; to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

ORGANIZATION OF THE MILITIA.

The House then went into a Committee of the Whole on the bill to provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining the Militia of the United States.

The first clause of the bill was in these words: "Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That, from and after the passing of this act, the Militia of the United States shall be composed of all able-bodied white male citizens, of the respective States, resident therein, who shall, respectively, be of the age of twenty years, and under the age of forty years; that the said Militia shall be divided into two classes—the first class to be denominated the select corps of the Militia of the United States. The select corps of the Militia of the United States shall be composed of all able-bodied white male citizens, respectively, who shall be of the age of twenty years, and under the age of twenty-five years. The reserved corps shall be composed of all able-bodied white male citizens, respectively, who shall be of the age of twenty-five years, and under the age of forty years: Provided, That, in the choice of officers, either in the select corps, or reserved corps, no respect shall be had to the limitations of age aforesaid; the foregoing regulations to be subject, however, to the exemptions hereafter specified."

It was moved to strike out this clause.

Mr. S. SMITH did not know the state of the Eastern militia, but that of the Southern States was totally useless for the professed purposes of the institution. The officers durst not, for a considerable time, have marched them against an enemy, during the late insurrection, if it had not been for a general idea that there would be no resistance. But this extreme deficiency had made several gentlemen turn their thoughts to that point, and to reflect on the absolute necessity for a proper militia. By the present law, you will have an hundred thousand young men, with arms in their hands, and knowing how to make use of them. They will, by rules laid down in this act, learn not only their exercise, but the essential duty of taking care of themselves, of cooking, and of lodging themselves. From the want of this knowledge, the militia, in the Revolutionary war, suffered much, and carried home from the camp contagious diseases that swept off whole families. What would be the behaviour of Britain, if she knew that you had an hundred thousand young men, well armed? She would not stop your ships on the seas, when there was not some real occasion, if she knew that the States to the east of the Hudson could instantly march thirty thousand men into Canada. Spain, on the Southwestern frontier, would be equally cautious, for fear of the militia of Kentucky and the Southern States. There would be no need of ever pulling a trigger. The Ministers of foreign Powers would inform their Governments of your internal strength, and they would be sufficiently careful. Everybody will tell you that the present time for keeping the militia embodied is too short. Instead of four days, Mr. S. supposed they would recommend eight. But this also was only trifling. At present, the day of exercise concluded with horse-racing, cock-fighting, and wrestling. Since the end of the late war, he always had in his head a plan of a militia, on something of that kind that is now before the Committee. In the war, he had seen much of them, and they were always very defective. He had formerly seen the Eastern militia. They were not good soldiers, though they were excellent materials for making them out of. He was particularly interested that this resolution should pass. The Government must either have a good militia or a standing army; for, the present militia, at least in the Southern States, do not deserve that name; and a militia was more agreeable to Republican principles. He endeavored to prove that the resolution was economical.

Organization of the Militia.

Mr. SEDGWICK observed, that two systems presented themselves to the consideration of the Committee. The first, that of compelling every citizen, capable of performing the duties of a soldier, to arm himself, or to receive arms, to be in readiness to be called forth in defence of his country. The other, that of selecting a part of those capable of performing military duties, and to have them educated and disciplined in such manner that they should be first called forth, and, in some degree, prepared to act as soldiers. He had the honor to be one of the committee which had reported the bill. He did not intend to pledge himself, at present, to vote either for or against the principle of forming a select corps. But he would take the liberty of stating to the Committee a few ideas, which ought to be taken into consideration to form an estimate of the merits of the proposed system. There were (he said) no accurate data from which the expense of the proposed system could with accuracy be computed. He was, however, induced to believe the proposed select corps would amount to 120,000. Gentlemen who know better than himself had informed him that their arms and accoutrements would amount to ten dollars per man, making - $1,200,000

Their clothes to twelve dollars per man 1,440,000
The rations, excluding all except the time while in service in the field, would amount to 2,400,000, which at ten cents per ration, would be - 240,000
Add for extra expenses of cavalry, tents, &c. - 30,000
The value of the time was not, indeed, to be paid out of the Treasury, but it was a loss to the productiveness of the public, and not less than four dollars for each man - 480,000
Total - - - $3,390,000

He would admit that the public facilities were equal to such an exertion; but whether the utility of the system would compensate for the burden to be endured, was for the Committee to determine. That the estimate did not exceed the truth, experience, if it should ever be had, he believed, would verify. To put this system in operation would then, the first year, be equal to a contribution of $3,390,000. This, it ought, however, to be observed, would not be the annual expense, for the value of the arms and clothing which might be returned, after deducting the wear and tear, ought to pass to the creditor side of the expenditure. There were some other circumstances which would result from this system, which had occurred to his mind as necessary to be considered: the loss which the community would sustain, by interrupting, annually, for so considerable a portion of time, in the most profitable and productive period of life, all the necessary and useful occupations of labor, would produce effects worthy the mature reflection of the Committee. In Sparta, the only country where an attempt had been effectually made to create a whole community of soldiers, the existence of slavery rendered labor disgraceful to citizens. They were, of course, very unlike the yeomanry of America, whose labor is equally required to continue their virtuous habits and to promote the happiness of our country. He would not declare that the alteration might not be beneficial, but he had no hesitation in pronouncing that it would produce a new state of society. Another consideration he would suggest to the deliberation of the Committee. It was, he believed, impossible to calculate what effect on the simplicity and sobriety of the morals of the rising generation might be produced, by congregating, in large numbers, youth without experience, unrestrained by that control to which it had been habituated.

Mr. LYMAN vindicated the military character of the militia of Massachusetts.

Mr. HULLHOUSE feared the worst consequences from calling out an hundred thousand young men. Some of them would be journeymen; others newly married. They would be forced to leave their employment, and lose their customers, who, in their absence, would employ others. The militia had been very useful in the last war. They took Burgoyne. Mr. H. was satisfied that if any other Power attacked America with regular forces, it would be found requisite to defend her with the same. No militia could supply the place of regulars, when attacked by troops of that kind. The present law would have a very bad effect on the morals of youth. It would be wrong to have an army all of young men, from the age of twenty to twenty-five. It would be better to have some old men among them.

Mr. PAGE feared that the expense would be enormous, and that it would be difficult to teach a militia the military discipline very exactly; but, if once they came in sight of an enemy, and in actual service, they would soon learn.

Mr. IRVINE said, that in his part of the country, besides the four days of mustering, there were usually two or three days of preparing, as the sweethearts of the young men usually attended. He knew that the gentleman who spoke last had been in the service, but he could not guess where he had picked up the information that eight or ten hours in the neighborhood of an enemy's camp would make a man a soldier. If something is not speedily done, we shall be in the same situation as in 1794, when the country depended entirely for discipline on the British officers who had retired from service, and on the sergeants among British deserters. He was in favor of the resolution.

Mr. WADSWORTH had been one of the select committee on this bill, and it might therefore be expected that he should have something to say about it. He hoped that the section would not be stricken out because it is not perfect. Though one of the committee, he did not like the whole of the system reported. But, sir, said Mr. W., which was so perfect as not to require modification. If the question before the Committee were, whether this report shall all go into a law, I would vote against it; but I believe the principle contained in the section to be absolutely necessary for the having such a militia as may be useful to correct any sudden insurrection or any foreign enemy. Much has been said of the late expedition against the Western insurgents; but was this the militia of the law? No, sir. In every State but one, from which they were drawn, it was not the militia of the law, drawn out by the militia law. It was a volunteer militia, influenced by their feelings, or by private bounties, in favor of Government. Mr. W. here asked, what a Government has to boast of with such a militia? Is it safe for any Government to rely on private, individual influence, to protect it against its enemies, whether foreign or domestic? No; it is dangerous. The same influence may be turned against the Government. If the present loose militia law has (and Mr. W. said that he knew it had) produced in Massachusetts a good militia, it has not done so here; nor, indeed, in any but a very small part of the United States. If the clause be struck out, we give over every hope of mending our militia law; and we must remain as we are, in a loose, deranged, uncertain situation. Mr. W. did not, by any means, approve the modifications of this bill. He did not wish for half, nor even a third part of the numbers which this bill would place in the select corps. The active militia in the late expedition might be boasted of, and have great merit, but they were not brought into the field by the law, but were the militia mostly of volunteers, or obligations to them, but the militia law, as it now is, would not produce an Army; and, if it remains so, the Government can hope but little from it, but, in any extremity, must depend on a militia of private influence. Mr. W. wished that the clause might stand, and, as in all other bills reported to this Committee, that such amendments might be made as to put the Government in possession of a force which can be relied on, and not to remain dependent on a force of individual influence.

Mr. TRACY was against striking out the clause. He imagined that it would be giving up all pretence to a reformation, which was much wanted.

Mr. HEATH was satisfied, that we had as much need of a new militia as we formerly had of a new Constitution, instead of the old rope of sand, a Confederation. He had seen militia going out to exercise, both officers and men, in a most careless and indifferent manner, with sticks, canes, and whips, and not one firelock among four of them. Was this the way to get a militia? Was this the sort of thing that the Continent, in an hour of foreign or domestic danger, was to look up to? The clause may require to be modified, but it ought most certainly to be kept in. The greatest losses in the last war came from want of training the militia properly.

Mr. GILES also was against the striking out. He hoped that gentlemen would let it go, and the bill have an experiment. He had not experience in the militia, but he had experience in committees, on the subject, for he had been on them for three or four years past.

Mr. SWIRT urged several objections to a select corps. He was entirely opposed to the report.

Mr. S. SMITH had formerly spoken of the militia of Maryland, whom he commanded in the late expedition, and he believed that those of Virginia were nothing better, if not rather worse. He mentioned an advice given by somebody, of not going near the water till you have learned to swim. The Virginia officers treated their soldiers pretty severely, for they very soon began to tie them up and give them an hundred lashes. He then attacked Mr. SEDGWICK, upon his calculations: as to the expense of an hundred thousand militia. The arms would cost nothing, for you have them already, in the repositories of the United States. Here were a million of dollars struck from the account. The tents that we have, will do, without new ones. As to camp equipage, such as kettles, tins, and so forth, one half of these expenses of the late expedition might have been saved, if these things had been in proper readiness; and if the law now proposed had then existed, this sum would have been saved. He noticed that many people, since returning from the Westward, had died of diseases contracted in the expedition, and which arose from ignorance how to take care of themselves. As to the coat, said Mr. S., sir, I voted against the coat, in the select committee, and the gentleman from Massachusetts voted for it; and now again he objects to it. The ration came next. They were guessed, and he believed with some accuracy, at two hundred thousand dollars per annum. And is a good, effective militia, of an hundred thousand young men, worth less than two hundred thousand dollars a year? Mr. S. said, that he would be greatly hurt at going out again, if it so happened, at the head of such a militia as the present. As to the scruples about bringing so many young men together, Mr. S. regarded this as the best time of life to do so. The whole was only twenty days in the year, for five years, and surely a man will not grudge an hundred days of a whole life-time, that are spent in learning to defend so admirable a Government. He thought that it would be well to employ the old officers of the Revolutionary war, as long as you have them, in training this select corps. They are dropping fast off, and then you must import drill-sergeants from other countries. Alluding to the remarks on expense, by Mr. Sedgwick, he said, that it was becoming the practice for gentlemen in that House to bring in a set of desultory observations, and then deduce unfair conclusions. He well remembered when, in last session, a gentleman from Virginia proposed a set of resolutions, that have since been called Madison's resolutions. Mr. S. was opposed to them. But it was said, that they would involve America in a war with Britain. This story answered its purpose both without and within doors, but Mr. S., who was against the resolutions, had always considered this part of the objections to them as the most ridiculous thing imaginable. Mr. Hillhouse had regretted that old men were not to be admitted into the select corps, for the sake of preserving the morality of the younger classes. I would ask that gentleman, said Mr. S., whether he is more moral than he was twenty-five years ago? It is the old that corrupt the young. [This observation produced a general smile.] Mr. S. would have no scruple of trusting his own son in such a corps. He noticed that the English militia, whom he had seen before the war, were as well disciplined, in his opinion, as the regulars; but then they were just as much at the beck of the Crown as the regulars.

Mr. Hillhouse vindicated his objections to the select corps being composed of men from twenty to twenty-five years of age. He did not like to cut down the old tree, till he knew whether the young one would grow. What if the young tree should not grow, and we had cut down the old one? We should then be much worse off than we are now, because we should have nothing at all, and the present militia were at least much better than nothing.

Mr. Sedgwick rose to explain, relative to his voting in the select committee for coats to the select corps, and then arguing in the present Committee against the whole scheme. He complained that Mr. S. Smith had spoken as if in anger. He, for his own part, never wished to point out the inconsistencies of gentlemen. Since he was now so hardly pressed, he would ask the member [Mr. Smith] how it happened, that when stating the expenses and resources of the Union, a few days ago, he had omitted eight hundred thousand dollars a year, that must be paid on different loans? Mr. S. read the particulars from a memorandum before him, and insisted that the gentleman ought not to bring forward, at this time, what had passed in a select committee.

Mr. Giles and Mr. S. Smith both rose together. The former declared that the gentleman was certainly out of order. The latter asked him, whether this affair of the eight hundred thousand dollars had any reference to the resolution before the Committee?

It was now generally requested that the Committee might rise. It was granted, and the Chairman asked leave to sit again.

FRIDAY, February 13.

A memorial of Amelie, Adelaide, Melanie, and Silvie de Grasse, four daughters of the late Count de Grasse, now residing at Salem, in the State of Massachusetts, was presented to the House and read, praying a loan of money for their present subsistence; the effects which they brought from France being exhausted, and having no other means of support, but in property in the Island of St. Domingo, from which, under present circumstances, no supplies can be drawn.

Ordered, That the said memorial be referred to Mr. Ames, Mr. Madison, and Mr. Gilman, with instruction to examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their opinion thereupon, to the House.

Ordered, That the petition of Isaiah Thomas, returned on the 5th ultimo, by the Secretary of the Treasury, be referred to Mr. Murray, Mr. Watts, and Mr. Kirtland; that they do examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their opinion thereupon, to the House.

The House proceeded to consider the amendment proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act supplementary to the act concerning invalids," and, the same being read, was agreed to.

MILITARY ESTABLISHMENT.

The House went into a Committee of the Whole on the bill for continuing and regulating the Military Establishment of the United States, and for repealing sundry acts heretofore passed on that subject.

In reading the several clauses of the bill, various objections were made.

The following is a copy of the third section:

"And be it further enacted, That the Legion of the United States be also completed to the number of four thousand eight hundred non-commissioned officers, privates and musicians, by voluntary enlistments for the term of three years, and that the sub-Legions composing the same be organized in such a manner as the President of the United States shall direct."

Military Establishment.

[H. or R.]

An amendment was moved by Mr. Madison, which was, that the troops should only be employed for the protection of the frontier.

Mr. Giles was against intrusting the President with any discretionary power as to where the troops were to be employed.

Mr. Fitzsimons said, that he had enjoyed the honor of a seat in that House ever since the beginning of the Government. He had noticed with attention the progress of the standing army, and he had seen that many members, who from the first had been against it, were, from experience of its necessity, now for it.

Mr. Wadsworth did not know a county in New England which could not destroy the little standing army of America in an hour. He had at first been the only man for regular troops, and now gentlemen who had been against this army were for it. There is a good militia in Massachusetts, but some time ago there passed a milk-and-water law in Congress, with hardly a New England vote to it, and since that time there have been no hopes of a good militia. As to the present amendment, it had been inserted in former laws, and never had hindered the regulars from marching any where that was thought proper. The amendment had done no good before, and he had no hopes of its doing any now. He was sorry for this little standing army, for it never comes before the House without meeting a rub. It has more to fear from its friends than from its enemies. Some people pretend to be jealous of the New England members, as attached to a standing army. The reason why they are so is, that they despair of ever seeing a militia, that will be worth one farthing. It had been said by Mr. Giles, that a party in the House wanted to employ the army as an instrument for executing the laws. If by this was meant preventing the whites from encroaching upon the Indians, and for suppressing insurrections, he hoped it would always be so; but, if this meant that the standing army should assist in the ordinary execution of the law, he hoped that it would not be needful, and that they would not do it. He would not say again, what he had said yesterday, as to the militia, but only this, that a militia raised by individual influence was more formidable to the United States than a standing army ever could be. He thanked God that the Government of the country was not left entirely to the House of Representatives, for he believed that they would make most wretched work of it. There were other branches likewise. As to weakening the army for fear that it should enslave us, he thought it like a man blunting the edge of his axe, for fear that he should cut his foot with it.

On dividing on this amendment, there were only twenty-six yeas.

Mr. Giles then moved, as an amendment, at the end of the third section, that "no enlistment shall be made after three years from the time of passing this bill."

Mr. Hillhouse could see no harm in this motion of Mr. Giles. It was agreed to.

The Committee rose. The bill, with the amendments, was reported to the House.

A motion was then made and seconded, further to amend the said bill, by striking out of the 15th section, the words "and inserting, in lieu thereof, the words "that the legion shall be reduced to the number of two thousand five hundred men, and the proportioned number of officers, whenever there shall be a peace with the Indian tribes; and that it shall be lawful for the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:" And it passed in the negative—yeas 25, nays 58, as follows:

Van Allen, Philip Van Cortlandt, Peter Van Gasebeck, Peleg Wadsworth, Jeremiah Wadsworth, John Watts, Benjamin Williams, Richard Winn, and Joseph Winston.

Another motion was then made further to amend the said bill, by adding to the end of the first section the following words: "for the protection and security of the United States against foreign invasion, and against the Indian tribes;" And it passed in the negative—yeas 36, nays 44, as follows:

Van Allen, Peter Van Gaasbeck, Peleg Wadsworth, Jeremiah Wadsworth, Paine Wingate, and Richard Winn.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendments agreed to, be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

SATURDAY, February 14.

An engrossed bill for continuing and regulating the Military Establishment of the United States, and for repealing sundry acts heretofore passed on that subject, was read the third time and passed.

Mr. WILLIAM SMITH, from the committee appointed, presented a bill making further provision for the support of Public Credit, and for the reduction of the Public Debt; which was read twice and committed.

Mr. TRACY, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the petition of William Seymour, made a report; which was read. Whereupon,

Resolved, That William Seymour be placed on the list of invalid pensioners, as being entitled to the half-pay of a Captain, in lieu of his present pension, to commence on the 5th day of March next, to be paid in the same manner, and at the same times, that invalid pensioners are now paid.

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in pursuant to the said resolution, and that the Committee of Claims do prepare and bring in the same.

Mr. BORDINOR, from the committee to whom was referred the report of the Attorney General of such tables of fees and regulations as are proper to be established for the Courts of the United States, made a report; which was read. Whereupon,

Resolved, That the table of fees reported by the Attorney General be printed for the use of the members; and the consideration thereof be referred to the next Congress.

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to bring in a bill to continue the act, entitled "An act to ascertain the fees in Admiralty proceedings in the District Courts of the United States, and for other purposes."

Ordered, That Mr. BORDINOR, Mr. KITTEBA, and Mr. SHERBURNE, be a committee pursuant to the last session.

Mr. COIT, from the committee appointed, presented a joint resolution, respecting certain laws of the Territory of the United States Northwest of the River Ohio, passed the first day of August, 1793; which was read twice, and committed.

Mr. DAYTON, from the Committee of Elections, to whom were referred the credentials of Aaron Kitchell, and of Robert Goodloe Harper, returned to serve as members of this House in the room of Abraham Clark and Alexander Gillon, made a report, as follows:

"That it appears, from a certificate signed by the Governor of the State of New Jersey, and under the seal of the said State, that Aaron Kitchell was duly elected to serve in the House of Representatives of the United States, in the room of Abraham Clark, deceased. That it also appears, from a certificate signed by the Governor of the State of South Carolina, with the seal of the said State annexed, that Robert Goodloe Harper was duly elected to serve in the House of Representatives of the United States, in the room of Alexander Gillon, deceased.

"Resolved, as the opinion of the committee, That Aaron Kitchell is entitled to a seat in this House, as one of the Representatives for the State of New Jersey, in room of Abraham Clark, deceased. "Resolved, as the opinion of the committee, That Robert Goodloe Harper is entitled to a seat in the House, as one of the Representatives for the State of South Carolina, in the room of Alexander Gillon, deceased."

The report was twice read, and agreed to.

DEBTS DUE THE GOVERNMENT.

The House, on motion of Mr. HEATH, went into a Committee, on the bill for the more effectual recovery of debts due from individuals to the United States.

The first section, which produced a debate of some length, was in these words:

"Sec. 1. Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Comptroller of the Treasury be, and is hereby authorized to issue a notification to any person, who has received moneys, for which he is accountable to the United States, or to the executor or administrator of such person, if he be deceased, requiring him to render to the Auditor of the Treasury, within ——— months, all his accounts and vouchers for the expenditure of the said moneys, comprehending a schedule of all claims of credit, or in default thereof, to remain charged with the moneys so advanced; and suits shall be commenced for the same, without further notice: And the party sued as aforesaid, shall be subject to the costs and charges of such suits, whether the ultimate decision shall be in their favor or against them."

It was moved to strike out the last sentence, and to insert in lieu thereof an amendment, signifying that the defendant shall not recover costs.

Mr. BORDINOR stated the very great difficulty of getting a settlement at the Treasury of the United States, on which account he himself had been put to the utmost difficulties, as well as many other persons with whom he was acquainted. This clause required that all vouchers should be lodged at the Treasury. Mr. B. had known vouchers lodged at the Treasury. The persons again called for them, with the official receipts, but in the course of years could not get them back again. It was on this account entirely tyrannical to attempt to make people lodge vouchers in such a place, where, by the loss of the papers, or their being mislaid, the parties concerned might be reduced to utter ruin. He was equally averse to the making of a new law for debtors of the State. This objection referred to the concluding clause of the section.

Mr. HILLHOUSE vindicated the character of the officers of the Treasury.

FEBRUARY, 1795.]

Debts due the Government.

[H. or R.]

Mr. BORDINOR explained that his complaints went only to blame the management under the old Constitution, but things had been left then in a state of inextricable confusion.

Mr. WADSWORTH would not oppose the bill altogether, because he was very willing that public money should be, if possible, recovered, but he could see no occasion for new and arbitrary laws, to recover it. He believed that out of every twenty debtors found in the books of the Treasury, not five would be found to owe a farthing. He knew many persons who had received discharges in full at the Treasury, and who, as he had no doubt, were still standing charged with large sums in the books. He considered the clause to be a clause of tyranny and violence. He entered into a detail of the frauds committed on the creditors of the public during the war, from the villany of agents and speculators, who crowded over Congress itself. At the Treasury, clerks were changing every day, and such a scene of book-keeping was exhibited there, as never had been seen any where else. Officers had come to this city with claims consisting of but a single line, and had to wait a long time, and borrow money to support themselves, and could not get the plainest account settled. Many honest men had been forced to settle in such a way, that they were reduced to beggary and sent to jail; and, from particular circumstances, the most honest men fared worst. He had seen all these things. He had felt them. He had paid, very fully, for this part of his knowledge. He mentioned a person who was sent from this city to New Hampshire to get fifty thousand dollars that were due to him. When he went there, he was told that there was nothing in the Treasury. He came back to Philadelphia, and, at the end of two years, he was forced to accept of depreciated paper, and the payment was stated to the public as made in specie. Mr. W. could not help protesting against this clause, when he knew of so many people who had been ruined by their connexions with the Treasury. He had escaped ruin, but others were not so lucky.

Mr. HILLHOUSE did not approve the manner in which the gentleman last up spoke of the Treasury, nor of the hardships said to be imposed by this law.

Mr. HEATH had the highest respect for the gentleman from Connecticut, and wondered how he could think it possible that an act of tyranny could pass under the present mild Government, which was the admiration of the world. His facts were specious, but fallacious, being drawn from the disastrous period of the war.

Mr. WADSWORTH replied, that he did not, indeed, expect to have heard of an act of tyranny under this Government, but an act of tyranny this clause most certainly was, and unfit for such a Government, and till it had passed into a law, he should continue to call it tyrannical. When passed, he would no doubt submit to it, but his inward opinion would still be the same, and his heart would continue to feel it as oppression. If I thought (said Mr. W.) that, by standing here, and speaking on till the fourth day of March, I could prevent this clause from passing, and that I should not fall down with fatigue, I declare that I would rather speak on, than consent to the passing of the bill, as it now stands. The gentleman from Virginia says, that my facts are specious and fallacious. Facts, however, they are, and if they must go out to the world, rather than they should go out as specious and fallacious, I will, myself, take the trouble to verify them from the public records.

Mr. BORDINOR knew that there had been men laboring for fourteen or fifteen years to get a settlement with the Treasury, and could not accomplish it. Their accounts were in such a condition that it would require the most expert accountant that ever was in the service of the Union, a year or two to clear them up. He himself had been laboring for ten years to get an account settled, and could not. Other accounts he had wearied himself in attempting to get ended, till he went to the office, and declared he would not quit it till the matter was finished.

Mr. LYMAN wondered that any body would venture to call a bill before the Committee tyranny. The present Secretary of the Treasury had said that these old accounts were in such a confused situation, that the law, as it now stands, would not do to get them cleared up. It would be better, Mr. L. thought, to make a conflagration at once.

Mr. WADSWORTH rose a third time. He would not thus trifle with the patience of the Committee, if something of this kind had not really been becoming fashionable. A gentleman had wondered how any body would call a bill before the House tyrannical. It was yet only before the Committee, and, therefore, he conceived himself at liberty to call it what he thought it. Much had been said to day about the opinions of gentlemen in the Treasury. But the other day, the tone was quite different. We were legislators, and not to receive opinions or information from any body. As to burning the books, Mr. W. did not approve of that either. It would be much better to let matters go on as they are. Mr. W. said, that, for his part, there was nobody who stood more independent than he did, either as to public or private money. He was all open, and ready to meet and answer every demand of every sort, that the world could bring against him. He had brought more public money to be accounted for than any man in that House; so that nobody could suppose him averse to getting justice done to the public from their debtors. He should feel, if the act passed as it now stands, that it was tyranny against many worthy men who had been injured by the public. The amendment was on a division negatived, and the clause went through, in substance as above. Some verbal amendments were made. The bill was then reported to the House, and agreed to, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading on Monday.

MONDAY, February 16.

An engrossed bill for the more effectual recovery.

ery of debts due from individuals to the United States, was read the third time, and passed.

An engrossed resolution, in the form of a concurrent resolution of the two Houses, respecting certain laws of the Territory of the United States Northwest of the river Ohio, passed the first day of August, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-two, was read the third time, and, on the question put thereupon, agreed to by the House, as follows:

Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That all the laws made by the Secretary and Judges of the Territory Northwest of the river Ohio, on the first day of August, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-two, excepting a law, entitled "An act to repeal certain parts of an act creating the office of Clerk of the Legislature," be, and the same are hereby disapproved.

A memorial of sundry manufacturers of snuff, in the town of Baltimore, was presented to the House and read, praying that so much of the act passed at the last session of Congress, laying duties upon snuff and refined sugar, as imposes a duty on snuff manufactured within the United States, may be repealed. Also,

A petition of the manufacturers of snuff in the town of Boston, to the same effect.

Ordered, That the said memorial and petition be referred to the Committee of the Whole House to whom is committed the bill to amend an act, entitled "An act laying certain duties upon snuff and refined sugar."

A petition of sundry merchants and mariners of the town of Wiscasset, in the State of Massachusetts, was presented to the House and read, praying that a light-house may be erected on Damariscove Island, instead of the one intended to be placed on Seguin Island, in the said State.

Ordered, That the said petition be referred to Mr. DEARBORN, Mr. WINGATE, and Mr. SHERBURN; that they do examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their opinion thereupon, to the House.

Mr. GOODRUE, from the managers appointed on the part of this House to attend the conference with the Senate, on the subject-matter of the amendments depending between the two Houses to the bill entitled "An act supplementary to the act entitled 'An act for enrolling and licensing ships or vessels to be employed in the coasting trade and fisheries, and for regulating the same,'" made a report: Whereupon,

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendments, do lie on the table.

Mr. BARNES, from the committee appointed, presented a bill to continue in force the "Act for ascertaining the fees in Admiralty proceedings in the District Courts of the United States, and for other purposes," which was read twice, and committed.

Mr. MURRAY, from the committee to whom was referred the petition of Isaiah Thomas, made a report, which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

surrection. He considered it his duty to support the motion. It had been the practice in Pennsylvania to publish the laws in English and German. Good consequences had resulted from it.

Mr. KITTERA, and several other gentlemen, spoke on the same side of the question.

Mr. MURRAY said, that it had never been the custom in England to translate the laws into Welsh or Gaelic, and yet the great bulk of the Welsh, and some hundred thousands of people in Scotland, did not understand a word of English.

Mr. BOURNOR was on the same side of the question.

The Committee went through the report. The Chairman reported the resolutions to the House, which were agreed to as follows:

Resolved, That there be printed, under the direction of the Secretary of State, a complete edition of — copies of the laws, to the close of the present session of Congress, to include the Constitution of the United States, the public acts which are now in force, and the treaties; and that they be divided among the respective States, and the Territories Northwest and South of the river Ohio, according to the rule for apportioning Representatives: that the number allotted to each State or Territory be transmitted to the Governor or Supreme Executive Magistrate thereof, in order to be deposited in fixed and convenient places in each county or subordinate civil division, as the Executive or Legislature of such State or Territory may judge most conducive to the general information of the people.

Resolved, That a like number of the laws passed at each succeeding session, and of all future treaties, be printed and distributed as above directed.

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in pursuant to the said resolutions, and that Mr. BALDWIN, Mr. MOORE, Mr. HEISTER, Mr. HUNTER, Mr. MACON, Mr. MURRAY, Mr. LATIMER, Mr. BEATTY, Mr. GILBERT, Mr. ORR, Mr. SWIFT, Mr. MALBONE, Mr. ISRAEL SMITH, Mr. DEXTER, Mr. WINGATE, and Mr. WHITE, do prepare and bring in the same.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill to provide for calling forth the Militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported several amendments thereto.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendments, do lie on the table.

TUESDAY, February 17.

An engrossed bill to continue in force the act "for ascertaining the fees in Admiralty proceedings in the District Courts of the United States, and for other purposes," was read the third time, and passed.

An engrossed bill to repeal part of the act, entitled "An act prohibiting, for a limited time, the exportation of arms and ammunition, and encouraging the importation of the same," was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. DEXTER, from the committee appointed, presented a bill to amend the act, entitled "An act respecting the Government of the Territories of the United States Northwest and South of the river Ohio," which was read twice, and committed.

Mr. BALDWIN, from the committee appointed, presented a bill for the more general promulgation of the laws of the United States; which was read twice, and committed.

Mr. TRACY, from the Committee of Claims, presented a bill for the relief of William Seymour; which was read twice, and ordered to be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

The House proceeded to consider the amendments reported yesterday from the Committee of the Whole House, to the bill to provide for calling forth the Militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions, and to repeal the act now in force for those purposes; and the same being read, were agreed to.

The said bill was further amended, and, together with the amendments, ordered to be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

Mr. TRACY, from the Committee of Claims, presented a bill, enabling George Gibbs to obtain a drawback of duties on certain exported wines; which was read twice, and ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time to-morrow.

Ordered, That a committee be appointed to bring in a bill for the relief of Spencer Man and Frantz Jacob Foltz, of Charleston, merchants, in certain losses relative to drawbacks on sundry goods exported previously to the first day of July, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-two.

And a committee was appointed of Mr. GOODRUE, Mr. HARPER, and Mr. HUNTER.

The following Message was received from the President of the United States:

Gentlemen of the Senate, and of the House of Representatives:

I transmit to Congress copies of a Letter from the Governor of the State of New Hampshire, and of an Act of the Legislature thereof, ratifying the article proposed in amendment to the Constitution of the United States, respecting the Judicial power.

I also lay before Congress copies of a Letter from the Governor of the State of North Carolina, and of an act of the Legislature thereof, ceding "to the United States certain lands, upon the conditions therein mentioned."

G. WASHINGTON.

UNITED STATES, February 17, 1795.

The said Message and papers were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting two statements, exhibiting the gross and nett amount of duties arising on distilled spirits, and on country stills, (drawbacks deducted,) during the years one thousand seven hundred and ninety-two, and one thousand seven hundred and ninety-three, pursuant to the resolution of this House of the second instant; which were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The following Message was received from the President of the United States:

Gentlemen of the Senate, and of the House of Representatives:

I have received copies of two Acts of the Legislature of Georgia—one passed on the 28th day of December, and the other on the 7th day of January last—for appropriating and selling the Indian lands within the territorial limits claimed by that State. These copies, though not officially certified, have been transmitted to me in such a manner as to leave no room to doubt their authenticity. These Acts embrace an object of such magnitude, and in their consequences may so deeply affect the peace and welfare of the United States, that I have thought it necessary now to lay them before Congress.

In confidence, I also forward copies of several documents and papers received from the Governor of the Southwestern Territory. By these, it seems that hostilities with the Cherokees have ceased, and that there is a pleasing prospect of a permanent peace with that nation. But, from all the communications of the Governor, it appears that the Creeks, in small parties, continue their depredations, and it is uncertain to what they may finally lead.

The several papers now communicated deserve the immediate attention of Congress, who will consider how far the subjects of them may require their co-operation.

G. WASHINGTON.

UNITED STATES, February 17, 1795.

The said Message and papers were read: Whereupon,

Ordered, That so much thereof as relates to the Acts of the Legislature of Georgia, for appropriating and selling the Indian lands within the territorial limits claimed by that State, be referred to Mr. NICHOLAS, Mr. MACOX, Mr. MURRAY, Mr. FINDLEY, Mr. BODINOT, Mr. AMES, and Mr. SHERBURNES, with instruction to examine the matter thereof, and report to the House.

Ordered, That such other parts of the said Message as relate to the communications from the Governor of the Territory of the United States South of the river Ohio, be committed to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

EXPORTATION OF LEAD.

Mr. FITZSIMMONS moved that a bill should be read a third time for permitting the exportation of lead. A former bill, which had been passed for repealing part of the act that prohibits the exportation of military stores from the United States, was rejected by the Senate; the present bill, which had lain over for some time, was, on that account, brought forward. Mr. F. said that he hoped it would pass.

Mr. VERMABLE hoped that it would not pass. The gentleman for whose sake this bill was in reality introduced, might wait, as well as other people, till the expiration of the existing law, which was to be in May next. He reprobated the idea of legislating for the sake of an individual, as a most irregular and dangerous precedent. The person had imported this lead with a knowledge of the law that prohibited its being sent out of the country again. This law might give an individual an advantage over other people.

Mr. FITZSIMMONS thought that this was the most disorderly reasoning which he had ever heard in the House. When this lead was imported, in the law that prohibited its being exported again, did not exist. Mr. F. asked, why the House might not legislate for an individual? As for waiting till the month of May, the ship was bound for India, and must sail, if she sailed at all, in March next. When the prohibitory law passed the arsenals were in want of lead. At present there is as much lead in the country as would supply all its demand for seven years. Why then adhere to this restriction?

Mr. DAYTON was in favor of the bill. He wished that the other had gone through the Senate.

Mr. KITTEKA considered the reasoning of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. VERMABLE] as the strangest which he had ever heard of. We legislate every other day for individuals, and insert their names, and the reasons for doing so, in the very body of the act. He could not then imagine why it should be opposed at this time.

A member said that he would oppose it, as having crept into the House in an extraordinary manner, so as to exclude all debate. He should therefore vote against it.

Mr. GOODHUE saw no reason why the bill should not pass, merely because it related to an individual. He saw no reason why the Legislature should not oblige an individual, when it could be done without injuring the public interest. If the United States were in want of the lead, that would be quite another thing.

Mr. HARTLEY thought that this bill was opposed upon extraordinary grounds. He was in its favor for reasons similar to those assigned by Mr. GOODHUE.

Mr. DAYTON explained, that the bill had gone through all the different and regular shapes, and had been fully canvassed some time ago. He read a part of the journals to illustrate his assertions.

Mr. GILES said, that if there ever had been any use for the prohibitory act in question, it was now superfluous. He moved to recommit the bill to a select committee, or a Committee of the Whole House. He wished for a repeal of the whole bill, not a partial repeal in favor of a particular person.

Mr. KITTEKA contended that Mr. GILES and Mr. S. SMITH opposed the bill on opposite principles. Both these gentlemen said that they thought Mr. K. had mistaken their meaning. He insisted that there was an opposition which opposed itself.

Mr. SEDGWICK could not see the use of hindering this bill passing. The lead is now lying in ballast, and if it does not go, specie must be sent instead of it. Why not unshackle this property, which is now useless, and bring it into action? What good was to be got by continuing the prohibition, Mr. S. said he was totally incapable of comprehending. As to the commitment, that also was, in every point of view, entirely beyond his conjecture as to any rational end proposed by it.

Mr. B. BOURNE was not much interested whether the bill passed or not. But he had another serious consequence to observe on, and that was the great waste of time on such a thing, when so great a mass of business was before the House. This bill had at different times taken up three days, and had been fully discussed. The session was drawing to a close, and he entreated that the question might be taken.

The bill was then passed—ayes 50, noes not counted.

ORGANIZATION OF THE MILITIA.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill to provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining the Militia of the United States.

On the first clause, Mr. SWIFT proposed as an amendment to strike out the words twenty, and insert eighteen, that the age at which persons were to be enrolled in the select corps, might be from eighteen to twenty-five years.

Mr. S. SMITH and Mr. JAVINE were both against this amendment, and stated the numerous inconveniences which attended the attempt of converting boys into soldiers. The former gentleman quoted the Memoirs of the once celebrated and still memorable Dumourier, who remonstrated to the Convention at Paris on this mode of recruiting.

Mr. DAYTON differed from these two gentlemen. He preferred eighteen as an amendment. Persons at that age could be more easily spared than when they were older, and engaged in business, and very likely married. Boys at eighteen would also learn the exercise faster than when twenty-five years old.

Mr. FITZSIMMONS said, that the gentleman had only looked at one side of the question. What would be the situation of a man with eight or ten apprentices called away for twenty days at a time? They would not be fit for the duties of a soldier. He should even have preferred twenty-one to twenty. He imagined that this would be a real discouragement to manufacturers. The young men returning to their employments might be less disposed for attending to them.

On a division the amendment was rejected—ayes 39, noes 40.

There was part of a clause in the first section in these words: "All able-bodied white male citizens." It was moved to strike out the word white.

Mr. KITCHELL said, that if the word white was struck out, he hoped that black would be inserted, as it was necessary that the militia should all be of one color. White men would not stand in the same rank with a negro.

Another member said, that he was not for a speckled militia.

Mr. BLOUNT replied that in the Southern States, there was a numerous class of men, who were neither whites nor blacks, but mulattoes.

It was not understood to be disgraceful to serve in the ranks with them.

A member from one of the Southern States declared that he was sure it was so considered in Maryland and Virginia. He remarked, however, that the subject was obviously and extremely improper for public discussion. He had before observed this to the House, when Mr. DEXTER made a motion referring to the same subject. [This was in the debate about the naturalization bill, when Mr. DEXTER proposed that foreign nobility should not be admitted as citizens of America till they first renounced the possession of slaves.] As the gentleman did not think his observations proper for the public ear, it would be an ungrateful trespass on the indulgence of the House to attempt a recital.

The amendment was negatived. The Committee now rose. The Chairman reported progress, and asked leave to sit again.

WEDNESDAY, February 18.

An engrossed bill for the more general promulgation of the laws of the United States was read the third time, and passed.

An engrossed bill to provide for calling forth the Militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions, and to repeal the act now in force for those purposes, was read the third time, and passed.

An engrossed bill enabling George Gibbs to obtain a drawback of duties on certain exported wines was read a third time, and passed.

An engrossed bill for the relief of William Seymour was read the third time, and passed.

A memorial of John Rutledge, administrator of Thomas Rutledge, deceased, was presented to the House, and read, praying the liquidation and settlement of a claim for the services of the deceased, as a Deputy Commissary General of Purchases for the Southern Department during the late war.

Ordered, That the said memorial be referred to the Secretary of the Treasury, with instruction to examine the same, and report his opinion thereupon to the House.

A memorial of Samuel Weir, Representative of the People South of French Broad River, in behalf of himself and his constituents, was presented to the House, and read, praying that the right of pre-emption to certain lands which they purchased of the Indians, and have since been ceded to the United States by the treaties of Seneca and of Holston, may be secured to the memorialists, and they be permitted to settle thereon.

Ordered, That the said memorial be referred to Mr. HILLHOUSE, Mr. JAVINE, and Mr. WALKER; that they do examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their opinion thereupon, to the House.

A memorial of Gunning Bedford, Judge of the District Court of the United States for the State of Delaware, was presented to the House, and read, stating the insufficiency of the salary allowed him by law, and praying that the same may be in-ceased, and rendered more adequate to his services.

Ordered, That the said memorial be referred to Mr. DEXTER, Mr. KIRKPATRICK, and Mr. HARRISON; that they do examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their opinion thereupon, to the House.

A petition of James Strange, of the town of Manchester, in the State of Virginia, was presented to the House, and read, praying a remission of the duties accruing on a quantity of salt the property of the petitioner, which was lost in consequence of the vessel in which it was laden having been driven on shore in a gale of wind, and bilged at Rockett's Landing, in the said State.

Ordered, That the said petition be referred to Mr. GILLES, Mr. PAXTER, and Mr. WINGATE; that they do examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their opinion thereupon, to the House.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to report the compensations given to the officers employed in the management of the revenue arising from stills and distilled spirits, not included in his report of the seventeenth instant, together with the number of officers employed in each State.

Mr. JEREMIAH SMITH, from the committee appointed, presented a bill for the relief of Robert Barton, and others; which was read twice, and ordered to be engrossed, and read the third time on Friday next.

Mr. ALEXA, from the committee to whom was referred the memorial of Amelie, Adelaide, Melanie, and Silvie de Grasse, four daughters of the late Count de Grasse, made a report; which was read, and ordered to be committed to a Committee of the Whole House immediately.

COUNT DE GRASSE'S HEIRS.

The House then went into a Committee on a memorial from the four daughters of the late Admiral Count de Grasse. It was read, with the report from a select committee, which proposed to give each of these ladies, who are now residing in Boston, and in indigent circumstances, a thousand dollars, in consideration of the important services rendered by their father to the United States. To this proposal the Committee agreed, and the Chairman reported the resolution.

The House then took up the report.

Mr. MACON objected that, though the claims of the petitioners were strong, yet they were not more so than those of multitudes of others. On the very day when we have come to a resolution to receive no more petitions from our fellow-citizens, we are going to give so large a sum at once to foreigners. He was aware that the Count de Grasse had done eminent services to America, and he felt them as much as any person, but still he saw no reason for preferring these petitioners, when there were likely an hundred of the officers of de Grasse, or of Rochambeau's army, that were in this country, and in want.

Mr. DEXTER said, that if there ever was a case where it would be proper to act first, and thereafter try to find reasons for what had been done, this was such a case.

The report was, on a division, agreed to by a great majority—sixty-one gentlemen rising in the affirmative. The resolution is in the following words:

Resolved, That, in consideration of the extraordinary services rendered the United States by the late Count de Grasse, in the year one thousand seven hundred and eighty-one, on the urgent request of the Commander-in-Chief of the American forces, beyond the term limited for his cooperation with the troops of the United States, there be allowed and paid to Amelie, Adelaide, Melanie, and Silvie de Grasse, daughters of the late Count de Grasse, respectively, the sum of one thousand dollars.

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in, pursuant to the said resolution, and that Mr. ALEXA, Mr. MADISON, and Mr. GILMAN, do prepare and bring in the same.

ORGANIZATION OF THE MILITIA.

Mr. BOURNOR moved that the House should, agreeably to the order of the day, resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill for organizing, arming, and disciplining the Militia.

Mr. DARTON declared himself opposed to this motion, as it would lead to a needless waste of time upon a subject or system which they should be unable to mature in the little time which remained of the present session. He said, that no one was more perfectly convinced of the inefficiency of the present system, or more zealously disposed to amend it than he himself was; but the discussion which this bill had already undergone was sufficient to satisfy his mind that they ought to postpone the decision upon a plan so new and important until their next meeting. He acknowledged that, in proposing this postponement, he was very much influenced by a belief that there was wanting not only time, but a proper temper and disposition to do justice to the subject, and to inquire into and remedy all the defects which had occurred or could be pointed out, under the existing Militia Law. It was easy to foresee that nothing effectual would be done by the present House, and to proceed further would therefore be useless, especially as there was other business in progress, which could not be delayed without very great injury. He therefore moved that the Committee of the Whole be discharged from the further consideration of the bill. This would supersede the motion made by his colleague, and if successful, he should afterwards move that a sufficient number of copies be printed and circulated for public information. The members would, by this means, have it in their power to learn, in the recess, the sentiments of their constituents, and be better prepared the next winter as to this important branch of legislation than they seemed now to be.

The question for discharging the Committee of the Whole was put and carried without a division; and, on motion, it was ordered that a thousand copies should be printed and dispersed through the States.

PUBLIC DEBT.

The House went into a Committee on the bill making further provision for the support of Public Credit and for the redemption of the Public Debt.

Mr. HILLHOUSE moved to strike out the first clause of the bill, and said, that if the provision contemplated in this bill for non-subscribing creditors had any intimate connexion with a permanent and systematic plan for the reduction of the Public Debt, his solicitude for the adoption of the latter would make him unwilling to object to the former; but, from a critical attention to the subject, and the Report of the late Secretary of the Treasury, he cannot find that a rejection of this provision will at all derange the system. He begged leave to premise his observation with one remark, which was, that no member of the Committee had a higher opinion of or greater respect for the talents and integrity of the late Secretary of the Treasury, or more lamented the loss of them to the public than himself; that his opinion had always been in favor of referring to the Secretary of the Treasury, whose official duty it was to be informed, for information and plans on the subject of finance, and that the fund of useful information contained in this report was a striking proof of the correctness of that opinion; but he never supposed himself bound to an implicit adoption of such plans as might be reported. It was his duty to examine and judge for himself.

Consistency of conduct, and impartial justice to all, was, in his opinion, as important for the preservation of our national character, as the punctual payment of our debts. Will not the adoption of this provision, which gives better terms to the non-subscribing creditors than to those who have placed confidence in your Government and cheerfully complied, be partial? Will there be consistency in our conduct, when, but a few sessions since, we almost unanimously rejected a petition from one class of those creditors, and, as far as was possible, made a Legislative declaration that no better provision ought or should be made? And would it be honorable now, since a great portion of these creditors, in consequence of the rejection of their petitions and despairing of better terms, have subscribed to your Loans, to turn immediately around, as soon as we have got them bound, and make a better provision for those who still refuse a compliance? The reasoning of the late Secretary of the Treasury, in favor of this principle, is too nice, and proves too much, and cannot be carried into execution. Will not these observations extend even to the old twenty dollar notes of 1775, many of which are now in possession of persons who received them, and were compelled by law to receive them, as gold and silver, in payment of their old debts. The fact is, that at the close of the late war, and even at the time of establishing the present Government, a literal compliance with all the then existing contracts and engagements, was well known and generally understood to be wholly impracticable. This Government, therefore, offered such terms as they thought just and equitable, and within the compass of their ability to fulfil; and, in the same act, held up the idea that no better provision would be made for non-subscribing creditors, for they were to have only four per cent, though their contract said six. Was not this more than a tacit, was it not an explicit declaration, that no creditor ought to hesitate about subscribing, for these were the best terms that would be given? And whatever we may say about the creditor having voluntarily given up his claim, if we did not give an opinion to receive the money at the Treasury, or to subscribe the Loan, it was in a degree a forced Loan. This, however, throws no imputation on the Government, for they did all that they were bound in honor or justice (all circumstances considered) to do; and every creditor ought, and every reasonable creditor will be satisfied. And to depart from the terms then held out, or to give better terms now, would be unjust, and, in his opinion, lessen instead of strengthening the confidence of the people in the Government. In times of peace and prosperity, and when our resources are ample, there is no doubt of our having sufficient credit. But if reverse of fortune should throw our affairs into some derangement, and we should be obliged to come forward with new terms or propositions for obtaining further loans or credit, would not every one be disinclined to accept them, under an apprehension that those who hung back might fare better? What would have been the situation of the United States if all had rejected the terms? Would it have been in their power to make a like provision for the whole Debt? And is it just that this class of creditors should derive an advantage from the ready compliance of others? How would it be in the case of an individual?—and I believe the same rules are to be observed to preserve the honor and credit of public bodies as that of individuals. Would it be considered honorable for a merchant whose affairs by misfortune should become embarrassed, and be unable to make prompt payment of all his debts, to offer to his creditors to pay them without interest, or at a certain rate upon the pound; and after a great proportion of his creditors had subscribed to his terms, to pay the remainder the full amount of their debts in money, and that, too, when there could be no compulsory process against him? If such an individual meant to preserve his credit and character, he must do equal justice to all; and so must the United States. There is no difficulty in doing this, by making provision to pay the principal of the unsubscribed Debt in the year 1801, when deferred stock begins to bear an interest of six per cent, and then to pay the arrears of interest by instalments, so arranged that the non-subscribing creditors, though they receive the nominal amount of their interest, yet, that at the time of receiving the same, the value of three per cent stock and the interest which may have been paid thereon, shall be equal thereto. We have passed a law this very session to open the Loan still further to non-subscribing creditors, and to pay a like interest to such as shall not subscribe, as is paid in the funded Debt. It is therefore unnecessary and improper to do anything further on that subject at this session.

Mr. SEDGWICK said, that the gentleman who made the motion, [Mr. HULLHOUSE], and his friend [Mr. GOONHURZ], who had seconded it, had submitted such reasons as neither his feelings nor his principles would permit him to pass in silence. With the latter gentleman he had the happiness during the arduous struggle which accompanied the Funding System, perfectly to concur in conduct, and till now, as he had always believed, in the principles assumed and in the objects proposed.

In an untired system of Government, and ignorant of the national resources, a provision for the Public Debt, the price of our Freedom and Independence, presented difficulties almost insurmountable; as all who participated in the labors of that day would remember. It might then have been believed, that a provision on the precise terms of the contract, was beyond the ability of the country, and therefore that the Government was under no obligation to make the attempt. This was not the foundation on which the Funding System was established. It might also, at that time, have been assumed as a principle that the public securities purported an obligation greater than justice required should be performed; and that, therefore, a system of depreciation ought in this instance to be applied, as in the case of the currency. Neither was the principle assumed.

The Government undertook, as in honor and conscience bound, to perform the public engagements; or to pay for a new modification, a valuable, an honest equivalent. Unacquainted with the competency of the resources which were contemplated, it was thought of great importance to procure the consent of the creditors to lessen the quantum of the immediate provision. To procure it, it was declared that the equivalent must not be nominal only, but real. That the consent must not be compulsory, but voluntary. And it was further declared, in the very act for funding the Debt, that act which was intended to secure the public faith and the public confidence, that nothing which it contained should be construed to impair the obligation of the Government to make complete provision for the non-subscribing creditors. Hence, the provision which the bill contemplated, so far from being, as was now suggested, an infringement of the Funding System, was pursuing not only the spirit, but was in exact conformity to the stipulations and a fulfilment of the solemn engagements it expressed. While we were ignorant of the productiveness of the revenue, the Government was justified in paying to the new subscribing creditors no greater amount than was paid to those who had accepted the terms which had been offered. At this time, while calculating on reducing the principal should the Committee reject the proposition before them, they would be without excuse; for, if the ability of the Government was adequate to a gradual discharge of the principal, it was certainly equal to fulfil its promises respecting the payment of the interest.

Mr. S. said, there was no alternative but to make the proposed provision, or to violate, not by implication, but expressly, the solemn and pledged faith of the Government. Whether, independent of moral considerations, the saving of a few thousand dollars should be a prevailing consideration for embracing the disgraceful part, gentlemen would determine. The whole of the unsubscribed Debt was somewhat more than a million, the difference, therefore, which could be made by assuming the unfounded principle that the Loan was originally compulsory, would be a mere trifle, infinitely too inconsiderable for the immense sacrifice which must be made to obtain it.

It was said that the subscribers would consider the proposed provision as an injury to them. This was to suppose, that they understood the promises of the Government to be a solemn mockery. That they were intended as a disguise which had proved too thin to hide the real intention that was. For himself, however, he would declare, that was he the proprietor of every dollar of the unsubscribed Debt, he would not hesitate for a moment to subscribe the whole, because he should prefer the stable provision and the funds which were pledged to satisfy it, as in the case of the Funded Debt, to the annual provision which was contemplated for that which remained unsubscribed. But whether such an election would be a discreet one was of little importance. It was enough that the claim of the non-subscribers was founded on the express engagements of the Legislature.

A conversation ensued, during which Mr. GOONHURZ avowed the principles and enforced the arguments of Mr. HULLHOUSE. At length an end was put to the debate by Mr. FITZPATRICK, who said, that he had always held that the terms offered by the Funding System were intended as an honest equivalent—that he believed that a provision would ultimately be made for the non-subscribers, in conformity to the stipulations of that act; and that he had the fullest confidence, that no gentleman who had concurred in that measure, would, on mature reflection, withhold his assent. But, as an act had passed the present session to continue the subscriptions through the current year, of which probably the Secretary was ignorant when he made his report, he was willing the measure should be postponed, until it was known what effects might be produced by it. He would therefore consent that the three first sections of the bill be struck out, which was done accordingly.

Mr. GILES moved to strike out the fourth clause, which empowers the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund, with the approbation of the President, to borrow, or cause to be borrowed from time to time, such sums in anticipation of the revenues appropriated, as they may see proper, not exceeding one million of dollars in a year. Mr. G. thought, that the present plan for discharging the National Debt was in reality a plan for augmenting it.

Mr. W. SMITH replied that there was nothing new in authorizing a loan under the direction of the President.

The Committee now rose, the Chairman reported progress, and the House adjourned.

Friday, February 30.

An engrossed bill for the relief of Robert Barton and others was read the third time and passed.

Mr. GOONHURZ, from the committee appointed, presented a bill for the relief of Spencer Mann and Frantz Jacob Foltz; which was read twice and ordered to be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

Mr. ALEX. from the committee appointed, presented a bill authorizing the payment of four thousand dollars for the use of the daughters of the late Count de Grasse; which was read and ordered to be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill, entitled "An act supplementary to the act entitled 'An act to provide more effectually for the collection of the duties imposed by law on goods, wares, and merchandise, imported into the United States, and on the tonnage of ships or vessels,'" with several amendments; to which they desire the concurrence of this House. The Senate have also agreed to the amendments proposed by this House to the bill, entitled "An act to amend the act, entitled 'An act to establish the Post Office and Post Roads within the United States,'" with several amendments; to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

The House proceeded to consider the amendments proposed by the Senate to the amendments of this House to the last mentioned bill: Whereupon,

Resolved, That this House doth agree to all the said amendments, with an amendment to the last amendment of the Senate to the first section of the said bill.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Vice President being absent, the Senate proceeded to the choice of a President pro tempore, and HENRY TAZEWELL has been duly elected.

The House proceeded to consider the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act supplementary to the act entitled 'An act to provide more effectually for the collection of the duties imposed by law, on goods, wares and merchandise, imported into the United States, and on the tonnage of ships or vessels.'" Whereupon,

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendments, be committed to Mr. SAMUEL SMITH, Mr. GOODHUE, and Mr. BOWDINOT.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill making further provision for the support of Public Credit, and for the redemption of the Public Debt; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported progress.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Agnus M'Lean;" to which they desire the concurrence of this House. The Senate have disagreed to the amendment proposed by this House to the last amendment of the Senate to the first section of the amendment of this House, to the bill, entitled "An act to amend the act, entitled 'An act to establish the Post Office and Post Roads within the United States,'" and desire a conference with this House on the subject-matter of the said amendment to the amendment; to which conference the Senate have appointed managers on their part.

The House proceeded to consider the message: Whereupon, Resolved, That this House doth agree to the conference desired by the Senate, and that Mr. HARTLEY, Mr. SEDGWICK, and Mr. GREENUP, be appointed managers at the same, on the part of this House.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the report of the committee to whom were referred the memorial of Mary S. Jones, and the petitions of Francis Nash, and of Francis Peyrinnaut, administrator of Pierre de Camps; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported a resolution thereupon; which was twice read, and agreed to by the House, as follows:

Resolved, That provision be made by law, for the relief of the petitioners, respectively, according to the prayer of their several petitions.

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in, pursuant to the said resolution, and that Mr. DENT, Mr. LEE, and Mr. HARTLEY, do prepare and bring in the same.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the report of the committee to whom was recommended the report of a committee on the report of the Secretary of War, respecting the fortifications of the United States; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said report under consideration, and come to a resolution thereupon; which was twice read, and agreed to by the House, as follows:

Resolved, That a sum not exceeding fifty thousand dollars, be appropriated for the purpose of completing the fortifications of certain ports and harbors in the United States.

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in, pursuant to the said resolution, and that Mr. SAMUEL SMITH, Mr. DEARBORN, Mr. DAYTON, Mr. PARKER, Mr. PICKENS, and Mr. MURRAY, do prepare and bring in the same.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill, entitled "An act for allowing an additional compensation to the Judges of the Districts of Rhode Island, and Delaware;" to which they desire the concurrence of this House. The Senate have also passed the bill, entitled "An act to provide for calling forth the Militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions, and to repeal the act now in force for those purposes," with several amendments; to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

The House proceeded to consider the amendments proposed by the Senate to the last mentioned bill, and the same being read, were agreed to.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the report of the committee appointed to examine and report on the state of the Mint, and what further measures may be necessary to render the institution more beneficial; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said report under consideration, and come to several resolutions thereupon; which were severally twice read, and agreed to by the House, as follows:

1. Resolved, That provision be made by law for the appointment of a Refiner and Melter in the Mint of the United States, whose duty it shall be, to take charge of all copper, and silver, and gold bullion, delivered out by the Treasurer of the Mint, after it has been assayed, and to reduce it into bars or ingots for the rolling mills; and then to deliver them to the Coiner or Treasurer, as the Director shall judge expedient; and to do and perform all other duties belonging to the office of Refiner and Melter, or which shall be ordered by the Director of the Mint.

2. Resolved, That provision be made by law, authorizing the Treasurer of the Mint to retain two cents per ounce, from every deposit of silver bullion below the standard; and four cents per ounce, from every deposit of gold bullion below the standard, unless the same shall require the operation of the test; then six cents, as a compensation for refining and melting the same.

8. Resolved, That gross bullion brought for deposit and coinage to the Mint, shall not be received in smaller quantities than two hundred ounces of silver, and twenty ounces of gold.

4. Resolved, That the standard for silver coin, as now established by law be altered, and made to consist of nine equal ten parts of pure silver, and one tenth part of pure copper, being equal to ten ounces sixteen pennyweights of pure silver in one pound troy.

5. Resolved, That the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, be authorized to reduce the weight of the copper coin at his discretion: Provided, Such reduction shall not exceed two pennyweights in each cent, and in proportion in each half cent; of which he shall give notice by proclamation, and report the same to the next session of Congress.

6. Resolved, That the Treasurer of the United States be authorized by law to distribute, at the public expense, all cents received from the Treasurer of the Mint; by sending them to some one bank in each State, where any are established, and where not, to the principal collector of such State, (in proportion to the number of inhabitants of the State,) to be by them paid out for cash, to any person requesting the same, in sums not less than ten dollars value.

7. Resolved, That provision be made by law, enabling the Director and Treasurer of the Mint to give a preference to bullion brought to the Mint, already of, or above the standard of the United States, so as not to be prevented coining and issuing the same, although bullion below the standard, and not yet refined, may have been deposited for coinage before it; any thing in any law heretofore passed to the contrary notwithstanding.

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in, pursuant to the said resolutions, and that Mr. BOURNOR, Mr. TRUMBULL, and Mr. HUNTER, do prepare and bring in the same.

The bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act for allowing an additional compensation to the Judges of the Districts of Rhode Island and Delaware," was read twice and committed.

MR. WILLIAM SMITH, from the committee to whom was referred the petition of Edmund Hogan, made a report, which was read, and ordered to be committed to a Committee of the Whole House to-morrow.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act for allowing an additional compensation to the Judges of the Districts of Rhode Island and Delaware;" and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported the bill without amendment. The bill was then read the third time, and passed.

MR. WILLIAM SMITH, from the committee to whom was recommended the bill to amend an act entitled "An act laying certain duties upon snuff and refined sugar," reported an amendatory bill to alter and amend the act entitled "An act laying certain duties upon snuff and refined sugar," which was read twice, and committed.

MR. HILLHOUSE, from the committee to whom was referred the memorial of Samuel Weir, Representative of the People South of French Broad River, in behalf of himself and his constituents, made a report; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

MR. DEXT, from the committee appointed, presented a bill for the relief of Mary S. Jones and others; which was read twice, and committed.

CASE OF THOMAS PERSON AND OTHERS.

It was moved that the House should go into consideration of the report of the select committee to whom had been referred a resolution of the House in relation to the back lands of North Carolina. The following is the resolution of the select committee:

MR. KITTERA also defended the expediency of the bill. The amendment of the Senate was rejected.

SURVEY OF SOUTHERN COAST.

The House next resolved into a Committee on the report of the select committee on the petition of Parker, Hopkins, and Miers, of Savannah, in Georgia. These gentlemen had been employed since the 12th of July, 1791, in surveying the coasts, &c., of Georgia. They implored the aid of the House in this arduous and expensive undertaking. The report of the select committee recommended that, as the affair was of a public nature, and as good charts were much wanted, the sum of ——— dollars should be loaned to them for the term of ——— years, out of the Treasury of the United States.

MR. GILES thought there would be no end of such claims if the practice were once fairly begun.

MR. HARPER (the new member from South Carolina) could give some information to the House on this subject. He had a personal opportunity of examining part of the execution of this work, and he conceived it to be very accurate. Georgia supplies the best timber for ship-building in the United States, and in a short time the commerce of that State will be a very great object. He hoped, therefore, that the House would not lightly reject this application. If the Constitution of the United States forbade the granting of money in this way, there was an end of it. But if ever a deviation was to be made from such a rule, perhaps this would be one of the most proper cases. The scheme had hitherto been carried on at the expense of a few individuals. He only requested that the House would not lightly refuse the prayer of the petition, since the thing itself was of so much consequence.

MR. MADISON would not hastily undertake to say that the grant of money was improper to be made to this affair as a public good. He did not at present wish to enter into that. He considered a loan, however, as the worst of all possible shapes in which the request could come before the House, for it was impossible to say where the practice of lending might stop. If assistance was to be granted in this case, he did not see why the survey should not be extended to other parts of the Union where it was equally necessary. Every private undertaker might in this way solicit a loan, when the object of his scheme was not public advantage but private emolument.

MR. MURRAY rejected all idea that the proposal was against the Constitution. Congress had surveyed the Western lands, and nobody supposed that beyond their authority. Why was there to be such a difference between land and water?

MR. BALDWIN stated, that the individuals had spent all they were worth upon this undertaking, and all which their friends could raise, and it would be a great pity if it should fail in the end for the want of so trifling a sum as three thousand dollars, which was all that was wanted. He explained the very great necessity for such a chart. At present there was none to be had that was fit for any—thing. Ships often lay for weeks, and even months together on the coast in the most dangerous situation, and unable to extricate themselves for want of charts. He adverted to the growing value of the commerce of Georgia, and to the remark of MR. MURRAY as to the right of Congress to survey both land and water. If a loan was disagreeable, the President might be desired to subscribe for a certain number of copies of the charts.

MR. S. SMITH approved much of getting good charts. If the Ambassador sent to Spain shall succeed in getting the navigation of the Mississippi opened, this coast of Georgia will very soon be of the highest importance.

MR. MADISON doubted whether the State of Georgia was not at present more able than the United States to subscribe.

MR. FITZSIMONS considered this as a very wrong time to bring in such a business, when the House are going to rise. His chief objection was to the mode, not the substance. He wished the matter withdrawn for the present, as the House had to proceed upon the Military Establishment.

MR. DAYTON had no doubt of the Constitution empowering the House to lend the three thousand dollars, but did not like the mode of lending it. He wished that the whole coast could be surveyed.

MR. PARKER and MR. HARPER each read a separate resolution in place of that recommended by the committee. It was then agreed to take the question upon it, and it was negatived. The resolution suggested by MR. HARPER was then read. But this also being found liable to many objections, the Committee rose, and the Chairman reported that they had disagreed to the report of the select committee, to whom the whole was again referred.

MILITARY ESTABLISHMENT.

The House next took up, in Committee of the Whole, the estimates of military appropriations for the year 1795, and came to certain resolutions, which were reported to the House. The House took them up.

MR. W. SMITH moved that there should be voted for defraying the expense of the naval armament, for three months, ——— dollars. If this motion was rejected, MR. S. said, that he should take the yeas and nays upon it, that it might be fairly known that gentlemen in the House were for abandoning the naval armament altogether.

MR. GILES said, that he had opposed it at every stage as an useless expense, and an improper way of attempting to attain the proposed object. He should vote against the appropriation.

MR. DAYTON thought that MR. W. SMITH had assumed an odd style. MR. SMITH had never heard him backward in fitting out a naval armament, and yet he should vote against the present motion, for this plain reason, that the money had been voted already.

MR. FITZSIMONS did not know whether the last year's provision extended to this. If it does, then this is a useless proposition.

MR. BOWDITCH thought that the provision did not extend, but that the money unappropriated was carried forward as surplus revenue, and that a new act was requisite to appropriate over again the money for the Navy.

Mr. W. SMITH did not suppose that the former appropriation continued in force, or he certainly would not have made this motion. He did not refer, at any rate, to Mr. DAVENPORT, when he spoke of gentlemen being against the armament altogether.

Mr. DAVENPORT read the act, which, as he thought, made it clearly out that the money yet stands in reserve. He wished the point decided before the House went further.

Mr. SEDGWICK recommended that this resolution should pass in the mean time. If the money was already voted, this could do no harm.

Mr. HILLHOUSE wished it to be withdrawn. No question was taken on it, but a committee were appointed to bring in a bill on the resolutions reported, which were as follows:

Resolved, That including the appropriation of five hundred thousand dollars made for the Military Establishment by an act of the present session, there be appropriated for the said Military Establishment, a sum not exceeding one million four hundred and thirty-nine thousand four hundred and thirty-nine dollars and twenty-nine cents.

Resolved, That, for defraying the expense of six months' pay and subsistence of a detachment of militia employed under the command of Major General Morgan, pursuant to an act of the present session, there be appropriated the sum of one hundred thousand six hundred and eighty-two dollars.

Resolved, That there be appropriated a sum not exceeding ten thousand dollars for the contingent purposes of Government, and subject to the disposition of the President of the United States.

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in pursuant to the above resolutions, and that Mr. FITZSIMMONS, Mr. MONTGOMERY, and Mr. FOSTER, do prepare and bring in the same.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill, entitled "An act authorizing the payment of four thousand dollars for the use of the daughters of the late Count de Grasse, with an amendment; to which they desire the concurrence of this House."

The House proceeded to consider the said amendment, and the same being read, was agreed to.

INDIAN LANDS IN GEORGIA.

The House next went into Committee on the report of the select committee to whom was referred the Message of the President of the 17th current, respecting the disposition of Indian lands by the State of Georgia.

The first resolution was read, and passed, without a division. It was in these words:

Resolved, That it be recommended to the President of the United States to use all Constitutional and legal means to prevent the infraction of the treaties made with the Indian tribes by the citizens of the United States, with an assurance that Congress will co-operate in such other acts as will be proper for the same end.

The second resolution was then read.

Mr. FITZSIMMONS said, he was much surprised how this first resolution had got through the House without opposition, for it was drawn in the most singular terms that he had ever seen. It was no less than a recommendation from that House to the President that he would take care to do his duty. He hoped that there was no necessity for admonitions of that sort. Mr. F. was told that he was not in order, as the resolution had already passed.

The second resolution was as follows:

Resolved, That it be further recommended to the President of the United States not to permit treaties for the extinguishment of the Indian title to any lands to be holden at the instance of individuals or of States, where it shall appear that the property of such lands, when the Indian title shall be extinguished, will be in particular persons; and that, whenever treaties are held for the benefit of the United States, individuals claiming rights of pre-emption shall be prevented from treating with the Indians concerning the same; and that, generally, such private claims be postponed to those of the several States, wherever the same may be consistent with the welfare and defence of the United States.

The Committee rose, the Chairman reported progress, and the House adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, February 25.

A memorial and remonstrance of the Legislature of the State of New Hampshire was presented to the House and read, praying the interference and support of Congress, in favor of the judicial power of the State Court, against an encroachment of the Judiciary of the United States, in reversing a decree of the Supreme Judicial Court of the State of New Hampshire, which was rendered in a case decided before the adoption of the present Constitution of Government of the United States.

Ordered, That the said memorial and remonstrance be referred to Mr. MADISON, Mr. MURRAY, Mr. BORDEN, Mr. CARNES, Mr. GILBERT, Mr. CORN, and Mr. HARPER, that they do examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their opinion thereupon, to the House.

Mr. FITZSIMMONS, from the committee to whom was committed the bill, sent from the Senate, entitled "An act to continue in force, for a limited time, the acts therein mentioned," made a report; which was read, and, together with the said bill, ordered to be committed to a Committee of the Whole House to-morrow.

Mr. FITZSIMMONS, from the committee appointed, presented a bill making further appropriations for the Military Establishment, and for the support of Government; which was read twice, and ordered to be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a statement exhibiting the number of officers employed in each State in the management of the revenue from stills and spirits distilled in the United States; as, also, a Letter from the Commissioner of the Revenue, relative to compensation to the said officers: which were read, and together with the resolution of this House of the 18th instant, on the subject-matter thereof, ordered to be referred to Mr. GILES, Mr. LYMAN, and Mr. SHELBURN.

Mr. W. SMITH, from the committee appointed, presented a bill making a conditional provision for the expenses of a treaty with certain Indian tribes; which was read twice, and committed.

A Message was received from the President of the UNITED STATES, communicating to Congress copies of a Letter from the Governor of the State of Georgia, and an Act of the Legislature thereof, "to ratify the resolution of Congress explanatory of the Judicial power of the United States."

The said Message and papers were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Resolved, That the Collector of the District of New York be authorized to allow the drawback on the exportation of two thousand yellow handled cutlasses or sugar knives, imported in the month of February, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-four, by Brothers, Coster, and Company, merchants, of New York, in the ship Peggy, Zacheus Henshaw, master: Provided, The same shall be exported, according to law, within two years from the time of the importation.

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in, pursuant to the said resolution, and that Mr. WATTS, Mr. GOODHUE, and Mr. WINGATE, do prepare and bring in the same.

A message from the Senate informed the House that they have passed the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Spencer Mann and Frantz Jacob Foltz, with an amendment;" to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

The House proceeded to consider the said amendment, and the same being read, was agreed to.

INDIAN LANDS IN GEORGIA.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the report of the committee to whom was referred so much of the Message from the President of the UNITED STATES, of the seventeenth instant, as relates to the disposition of Indian lands by the Legislature of the State of Georgia.

Mr. AWES said, that during the time when the National Debt bill was under discussion, he had attempted to get something introduced in favor of the new emission money creditors, but gentlemen always rose en masse against any proposal that would tend to obstruct the progress of the bill. He now again urged that this affair might be taken into consideration. He knew he should be told of a standing rule of the House, that the unfinished business must first be taken up. These creditors had waited for four years without redress, and the rules of the House ought to give way to common feeling and common sense. He therefore moved that the rule in question should be suspended.

The motion was negatived, and the House then went into a Committee upon the second and remaining resolutions in the report of the select committee on the Message of the President.

The following is a copy of the third and fourth resolutions in this report:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be authorized, whenever claims under prior contracts may cease to exist, to obtain a cession of the State of Georgia, of their claim to the whole or any part of the land within the present Indian boundaries; and that — dollars ought to be appropriated to enable him to effect the same.

Resolved, That all persons who shall be assembled, or embodied in arms, on any lands belonging to Indians, out of the ordinary jurisdiction of any State, or of the Territory South of the river Ohio, for the purpose of warring against the Indians, or committing depredations upon any Indian town, or persons, or property, shall thereby become liable and subject to the rules and articles of war, which are, or shall be established for the government of the troops of the United States.

After some discussion, the Committee rose; the Chairman reported progress, and asked leave to sit again. This was negatived—yeas 33, nays 35.

The House then took up the resolutions. Various amendments were proposed; and the last resolution, in particular, was objected to, as subjecting people to martial law.

Mr. WADSWORTH said, that from a trial by jury he had no hopes. There never had been one instance of a white man condemned and hanged by white men, on the frontier, for the murder of an Indian, since the first landing in America. There might be such a thing for the murder of an Indian, when they lived among the whites. That there ever had been such a thing, he did not know. He had been told by Judges, upon the frontier, that it was no matter what evidence of a murder of an Indian was brought. No jury would bring the criminal in guilty. It was but very lately that a cool and unprovoked murder had been committed on the borders of this State upon an Indian. The evidence was clear. Nobody pretended to doubt it. The Judge gave an earnest charge to the jury; but all to no purpose; they found "not guilty."

Mr. SEDGWICK proposed an amendment to the last resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That all persons who shall be assembled, or embodied in arms, on any lands belonging to Indians, out of the ordinary jurisdiction of any State, or of the Territory South of the river Ohio, for the purpose of warring against the Indians, or of committing depredations against any Indian town, or persons, or property, shall thereby become liable and subject to be taken and confined by the military force of the United States, in such manner as to be made amenable to, and triable by law.

Ordered, That the said motion be committed to Mr. SEDGWICK, Mr. MADISON, and Mr. HILLHOUSE.

THURSDAY, February 26.

An engrossed bill making further appropriations for the Military Establishment, and for the support of Government, was read the third time and passed.

Mr. BEATTY, from the committee appointed, present a bill laying a duty on carriages for the conveyance of persons, and repealing the former act for that purpose; which was read twice and committed.

Mr. BOURNIX, from the committee appointed, presented a bill supplementary to the act, entitled "An act establishing a Mint, and regulating the coins of the United States," which was read twice, and ordered to be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

Ordered, That a committee be appointed to bring in a bill to repeal the second section of the act, entitled "An act for allowing compensation to the members of the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States, and to the officers of both Houses."

And a committee was appointed, of Mr. HEATH, Mr. SMILE, and Mr. MACON.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill, sent from the Senate, entitled "An act to continue in force, for a limited time, the acts therein mentioned;" and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose, and reported an amendment thereto; which was twice read, and agreed to by the House. The said bill, with the amendment, was then read the third time and passed.

Mr. WATTS, from the committee appointed, presented a bill for extending the time relative to drawbacks on the exportation of certain military stores; which was read twice, and ordered to be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill for the relief of Mary S. Jones, and others; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported progress.

On the question, that this House will, to-morrow, again resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the said bill? it passed in the negative.

The House proceeded to consider the resolutions reported yesterday, from the Committee of the Whole House, on the report of the committee to whom was referred so much of the Message of the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, of the seventeenth instant, as relates to the disposition of Indian lands by the Legislature of the State of Georgia; and the said resolutions being amended at the Clerk's table, were agreed to by the House, as follows:

1st. Resolved, That Congress will co-operate with the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES in giving due effect to all such Constitutional and legal means as he shall adopt and pursue to prevent the infraction of the treaties made with the Indian tribes.

2d. Resolved, That it be recommended to the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, not to permit treaties for the extinguishment of the Indian title to any lands, to be holden at the instance of individuals or States, where it shall appear that the property of such lands, when the Indian title shall be extinguished, will be vested in, or claimed by, particular persons: And that, whenever treaties are held for the benefit of the United States, individuals claiming rights of pre-emption shall be prevented from treating with the Indians concerning the same; and that, generally, such private claims be postponed to those of the several States, wherever the same may be consistent with the welfare and defence of the United States.

3d. Resolved, That the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES be authorized to obtain a cession of the State of Georgia of their claim to the whole, or any part, of the land within the present Indian boundaries.

Ordered, That the first and second resolutions do lie on the table.

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in pursuant to the last resolution, and that Mr. NICHOLAS, Mr. MACON, Mr. MURRAY, Mr. FINDLEY, Mr. BOURNIX, Mr. AMES, and Mr. SHERRBURNE, do prepare and bring in the same.

Mr. SEDGWICK, from the committee to whom was referred a motion of the twenty-fifth instant, respecting such persons as shall be assembled, or embodied in arms, on any lands belonging to Indians, out of the ordinary jurisdiction of any State, or of the Territory of the United States South of the river Ohio, made a report; which was read, and ordered to be committed to a Committee of the Whole House to-morrow.

FRIDAY, February 27.

An engrossed bill supplementary to the act, entitled "An act establishing a Mint, and regulating the coins of the United States," was read the third time, and passed.

An engrossed bill for extending the time relative to drawbacks on the exportation of certain military stores, was read the third time, and passed.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill, entitled "An act to prevent depredations on the Indians South of the river Ohio;" to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

The said bill was read the first time, and opposition being made to the same, the question was taken, to wit: "Shall the said bill be rejected?" and resolved in the affirmative—yeas 43, nays 37, as follows:

YEAS.—Theodoras Bailey, Abraham Baldwin, John Beatty, Thomas Blount, Elias Boudinot, Thomas P. Carnes, Gabriel Christie, Thomas Claiborne, Gabriel Duval, Benjamin Edwards, William B. Sherburne, Jeremiah Smith, George Thatcher, John E. Van Allen, Peter Van Gasebeck, Jeremiah Wadsworth, Artemas Ward, John Watts, Paine Wingate, and Richard Winn.

Mr. MADISON, from the committee to whom was referred the memorial and representation of the Legislature of New Hampshire, made a report; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. NICHOLAS, from the committee appointed, presented a bill to authorize the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES to obtain a cession of claim to certain territory; which was read twice and committed.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, accompanying a return of the exports of the United States, for one year, ending the thirtieth of September, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-four; as, also, an explanatory Letter to him, from the Commissioner of the Revenue; which were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill, entitled "An act relative to sessions of jurisdiction in places where light-houses, beacons, buoys, and public piers, have been, or may hereafter be, erected and fixed," with several amendments; to which they desire the concurrence of this House: the Senate have also passed a bill, entitled "An act relative to the passing of coasting vessels between Long Island and Rhode Island;" to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

The bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act relative to the passing of coasting vessels between Long Island and Rhode Island," was read three times and passed.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill, entitled "An act for the relief of William Seymour;" the Senate have also passed the bill, entitled "An act to regulate the compensation of Clerks;" to which they desire the concurrence of the House. The Senate have also agreed to a resolution "authorizing the exportation of arms, cannon, and military stores, in certain cases;" to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

The House proceeded to consider the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act relative to sessions of jurisdiction in places where light-houses, beacons, buoys, and public piers, have been, or may hereafter be, erected and fixed;" and the same being read, were agreed to.

The bill, sent from the Senate, entitled "An act to regulate the compensation of Clerks," was read twice and committed.

SNUFF AND SUGAR DUTIES.

The House then went into a Committee, Mr. SHERRBURNE in the Chair, on the bill to alter and amend the act, entitled "An act laying certain duties upon snuff and refined sugar."

The first section of the bill was read, and is in these words:

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the duty of eight cents per pound, laid by the act of the last session, entitled 'An act laying certain duties upon snuff and refined sugar,' shall cease on the last day of March, in the present year, and shall not thenceforth be collected; but, in lieu thereof, there shall be levied and collected upon all snuff employed in the manufacture of snuff in the United States, the following yearly rates and duties, to wit: For and upon each and every mortar contained in any mill worked by water, and for every pair of mill-stones employed in the manufacture of snuff, — dollars; upon every pestle in any mill, other than mills worked by hand, — dollars; upon every pestle in any mill worked by hand, — dollars; and upon every mill in which snuff is manufactured by stampers and grinders, — dollars per annum."

Mr. CORR moved to strike out the section.

Mr. B. BOURNIX seconded the motion.

Mr. W. SMITH said, that the committee had taken a great deal of care in learning how matters stood, and found, both from the manufacturers and officers of excise, that alterations were equally necessary for the existence of the manufacturers and the revenue. If this bill was destroyed, there would be the utmost inconvenience to the manufacturer, and very little chance of revenue.

Mr. FITZSIMONS vindicated the clause. It would be seen at once, that the present bill simplified the operation exceedingly. It prevented the necessity for the attendance of excise men, and the swearing of the manufacturer. He did not expect to improve the revenue, but it would be more easily raised. He did not see what Mr. BOURNIX had feared, that the law would bear hard upon persons of small capital. He understood it to be rather in their favor than otherwise.

Mr. SEDGWICK said, that all taxes ought to be levied with as little trouble as possible to the persons who pay them. He feared that the section before the Committee might produce inequalities. The Committee may have been wrongly informed by tobaccoists, and he could suppose that these individuals might themselves be unacquainted with the way in which the manufacture is carried on in other and distant parts of the Union.

Mr. MADISON was clearly in favor of the clause, as much better than the original idea.

The motion of Mr. CORR, for striking out the first clause, was negatived by a great majority.

The Committee went through the other clauses of this bill, with very little debate. It was then reported by the Chairman to the House. A motion was made that it should be taken up immediately.

Mr. HEISTREE hoped that it would not, as there was an amendment intended to be also made in favor of the snuff-makers.

The House, however, took up the bill, which was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

A resolution from the Senate, for a partial repeal of the law against the exportation of arms and ammunition, was read and referred to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. W. SMITH said, that he did not see the use of resolutions for repealing bills. It would be much better to strike out the word "resolved," and insert "be it enacted."

INDIAN LANDS IN GEORGIA.

The House then went into a Committee of the Whole, Mr. SHERMAN in the Chair, on the report of the select committee to whom had been referred the motion of the 25th instant, respecting such persons as shall be assembled, or embodied in arms, on any lands belonging to Indians, out of the ordinary jurisdiction of any State, or of the Territory of the United States South of the river Ohio. The resolutions are as follows:

"Resolved, That all persons who, unauthorized by law, may be found in arms on any lands westward of the lines established by treaties with the Indian tribes, shall, on conviction thereof, forfeit a sum not exceeding ——— dollars, and be imprisoned not exceeding ——— months.

"Resolved, That it shall be lawful for the military force of the United States to apprehend every person or persons found in arms, as aforesaid, and him or them to convey to the civil authority of the United States, within some of the States, who shall, by such authority, be secured, to be tried in manner hereafter expressed.

"Resolved, That, every person apprehended, as aforesaid, shall be tried in manner and form as is expressed in and by the act, entitled 'An act to regulate trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes.'"

Several amendments were proposed and agreed to. At last, Mr. VENABLE proposed one, which was, in substance, that persons should not be liable to the operation of the law who were in pursuit of Indians that had committed actual hostilities on the frontier.

Mr. SEDGWICK paid many compliments to Mr. VENABLE, as a sound lawyer, who certainly knew that, by the inherent rights of nature, every man was to pursue and punish those who had robbed him. This was implied in the bill, and was a part of the law of nature, so that there could be no use for its insertion.

Mr. VENABLE, in reply, declared that he was not so sound a lawyer as the gentleman supposed him to be. He was not so sound a lawyer as to discover that there was any such implication in the bill as the gentleman stated. Neither was he a sound enough lawyer to see, that, if his amendment was really implied in the bill, there could be any harm in having it expressed. At present he could discover no such implication. On the contrary, he saw very plainly, that, by the resolution as it now stood, a man whose family had been murdered or carried off by the savages, might, while pursuing them, be stopped and sent to jail. Mr. V., from the admission of Mr. SEDGWICK himself, insisted on the propriety of adopting his amendment.

Mr. HILLHOUSE objected to the permission of armed individuals crossing the line, upon any pretence whatever. What use was there for expending millions every year in defence of the frontier people, if they were to be at liberty to cross the Indian line as often as they pleased, and to do what was to all intents and purposes carrying on war? If they will fight, let us recal our forces and leave them to fight for themselves. Are they, for the stealing of a horse, or some such thing, to cross the line in armed bodies, and act just as they please? Mr. H. utterly denied the doctrine admitted by Mr. SEDGWICK, that a man was authorized to chastise by his own hand those who had injured him. Was he to be both judge and executioner in his own case? No such thing.

Mr. GREENUP said, that, in coming to Congress every year, he was obliged to pass over territories belonging to Indians, and he always thought it necessary to carry a gun. He did not see, by the resolution as it stood, why the military officers of the United States might not stop him, as well as other people.

Mr. MOORE objected to the clause, altogether. It is usual for people on the frontier to send out parties over the line to watch the Indians, and when they are coming to give notice, that the country may be prepared for their reception. Now, these people may be seized by your officers.

Mr. FINLEY imagined it would be the best way to declare that there shall be no frontier. It had been said by Mr. HILLHOUSE, that the United States might withdraw their forces, and leave the frontier settlers to defend themselves. Did he imagine, that as it is, they are not kept in a perpetual state of alarm, of exertion, and of danger? There has not been a harvest for many years past where the people have not been called off from their labors, and, to their very great loss, to protect the frontier. This resolution not to allow a pursuit, would be inviting the Indians with a witness.

Mr. SEDGWICK said, that this amendment, in reality, destroyed all that had been done or intended. No military officer, after such an amendment, will run the risk of taking a man up. The prisoner has only to say, "I am in pursuit of Indians," and then he must be set at liberty; for, in the wilderness, no evidence can be had to contradict him. The amendment, therefore, was a coup de grace to the whole affair. Mr. S. said he was personally extremely hurt at the constant complaints of the inefficiency of the defence afforded on the frontier, which cost annually so much to Government.

Mr. BLOUNT thought that the best way would be, to let it be known that the whites were authorized to pursue the Indians into their own country, and then they would stand more in awe. He mentioned a circumstance that happened within memory, to prove how much the Indians feared a serious attack, and how well they remembered a serious chastisement. Mr. B. stated that some Indians had made an incursion, and were stealing cattle belonging to the Army, at a block-house. One of them was most deservedly shot, and the soldier had his pay stopped.

Mr. HILLHOUSE said, the more that he thought of this amendment, the more he saw its mischievous consequences. It went to invert all the laws that had been made for the protection of the Indians; and, instead of being a bill to protect them from the whites, the resolutions would produce a bill to protect the whites from them.

Mr. SMITH objected to Mr. SEDGWICK's having threatened that the Army of the United States should be withdrawn from the frontiers. [He had made some other advances against that gentleman, to which Mr. SEDGWICK answered not loud enough to be heard; but at this last, he arose, and said that he would not sit still to hear himself thus quoted for affirmations of which he had never uttered a single word.]

Mr. FITZSIMONS really hoped that the House would not agree to this amendment. It would totally defeat all the effects proposed by the bill. It had been said that if a man had his family murdered, and he was in pursuit of the murderers, he might be stopped, by a military officer, and sent to jail. The answer was, that if the officer refused to join him in the pursuit, he would lose his commission. He should be sorry if those resolutions, which had cost so much time and labor to the House, were thus to be thrown away.

The amendment was, on a division, carried—years 36, nays 28. The Committee then rose.

SATURDAY, February 28.

An engrossed bill to alter and amend the act, entitled "An act laying certain duties upon snuff and refined sugar," was read the third time and passed.

Mr. HEATH, from the committee appointed on the 12th of December last, respecting the settlement of the accounts of the former Government, and the unpaid balances due thereon, reported a statement of accounts which originated under the late Government, and which have been settled since the establishment of the Treasury Department, to the 31st day of December, 1794; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill, entitled "An act to amend the second section of an act to erect a light-house on the head-land of Cape Hatteras, and a lighted beacon on Shell Castle Island, in the harbor of Ocracoke, in the State of North Carolina," to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

The said bill was read twice, and ordered to be committed to Mr. B. BOWEN, Mr. BLOUNT, and Mr. WATTS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Report from the Secretary of War, accompanying further statements in the cases of claimants to be placed on the list of pensioners, returned to the War Office by the Judges of the District Courts of the United States, since his report of the 21st instant, and of the additional evidence received further to support certain claims, formerly stated; which were read, and ordered to be referred to the Committee of Claims, with instructions to the Committee, by bill or otherwise.

Mr. BEATTY at several times had moved that the bill amendatory of the "act laying duties upon carriages for the conveyance of persons," reported by him a few days since, should be taken up. The pressure of other more important business before the House prevented his motion from succeeding, so that this bill may be expected to stand over in its present shape till next session.

Mr. TRACY, from the Committee of Claims, to whom were referred the reports of the Secretary of War, accompanying sundry statements in the cases of claimants to be placed on the list of pensioners returned to the War Office by the Judges of the District Courts of the United States, made a report; which was read. Whereupon, Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in making provision for the cases of the said claimants, respectively; and that the Committee of Claims do prepare and bring in the same.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill, entitled "An act to authorize a grant of lands to the French inhabitants of Gallipolis, and for other purposes therein mentioned," to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

The said bill was read twice, and ordered to be committed to Mr. SWIFT, Mr. SCOTT, and Mr. VENABLE.

Mr. SEDGWICK, from the committee appointed, presented a bill supplementary to the act, entitled "An act to regulate trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes," which was read twice, amended at the Clerk's table, and, together with the amendments, ordered to be engrossed, and read the third time on Monday next.

INDIAN TRADING HOUSES.

It was moved that the House should resolve itself into a Committee on the bill for establishing trading houses for the purpose of supplying the Indian nations within the territory of the United States. This was done accordingly, Mr. SHERMAN in the Chair.

Mr. GILLES then moved to strike out the first section.

Mr. GOODRICH wished to move that the Committee rise; to which Mr. GILLES agreed. Mr. GOODRICH then said, that his reason for this motion was the inattention of members to the business before them. To attempt going through the bill at present was a perfect farce. He was satisfied that the bill would never go through this session. He did not, for his own part, yet know whether it was proper or not.

Mr. PARKER said, that the bill had been long enough before the House for the gentleman from Massachusetts to have made himself acquainted with its contents and its merits. He vindicated the principle of the bill, as tending to conciliate the affections of a distressed and unhappy people, and as it might likewise prevent the expenses of a war with them. France, Britain, and Spain, had adopted this policy, and found the good effects of it. He considered the bill as of the utmost consequence, and, thinking so, he should use his utmost influence to get it passed. The expense proposed was not great, as the affair was only experimental.

Mr. MONTGOMERY was of the same opinion with the gentleman who spoke last. He thought that the Indians had common sense enough not to quit allies who supplied them with articles which they wanted, till we also made some effectual establishment of that kind. The member went on the same ground with the gentleman who spoke last.

Indian Lands in Georgia.

[FEBRUARY, 1795.]

Mr. Boudinot thought that the reason given by Mr. Goodhue for moving that the Committee should rise, viz: that gentlemen would not attend to their duty, was the worst imaginable. What did the House meet for at all? It was the duty of the Chair to compel them to mind their business. Mr. B. then referred to something which had been said by Mr. Swift, who had been up just before Mr. Boudinot. Mr. B., in reply to this gentleman, said, that he would not wish to press the bill this session if members did not think it proper. He was willing, if agreeable, to refer the matter for one year to the President. But there never would nor could be a complete peace till something of this kind was done. The President himself had told us as much.

Mr. Giles said, that the bill could not be got through this session. He was willing to take the question either in the first way that he had moved it, or in any other. This was a most improper time of the session to bring it in.

Mr. Murray hoped that the Committee would seriously attend to the first clause in the bill, and would not rise. He felt the shortness of the time, but he was willing to devote to-morrow (Sunday) to this subject, and he trusted that the importance of it would give the employment a solemnity not inconsistent with the day. Without a bill to establish a well-guarded intercourse with the Indians, the frontier policy will be unsystematic and despicable. To complete the system, it appeared to him that three great objects are to be embraced: 1st. Force to protect the frontier from Indian invasion—for this the military establishment is made. 2d. A regulation, by law, that shall restrain the frontier people from predatory invasion into the Indian country, carrying law and settlement hand in hand. 3d. The establishment of trading houses under the influence of the two first parts of the system, for the purpose of conciliating the Indians by supplying their wants, and detaching their habits of trade and their affections from a foreign nation. With these three points embraced in one system, he had no doubt but their co-operation would produce the great object, peace on the frontier. Without the last, the other parts of the system would be totally inefficient.

Mr. Hillhouse said, that the House ought to begin at the right end of the subject, by reversing the vote which the Committee passed yesterday, authorizing the frontier people to pass the line in pursuit of the Indians as often as they pleased. If this was allowed, it would be impossible ever to keep the peace.

On a division, shall the Committee now rise? it was determined in the affirmative—Yeas 35, nays 31.

The question was then put by the SPEAKER, Shall the Committee have leave to sit again? It passed in the affirmative—Yeas 34, nays 33.

But it was presently remarked, that some gentlemen had risen both in the yeas and nays; others had been without the bar. The question was, therefore, taken over again, and determined in the negative—Yeas 36, nays 41. The bill is, therefore, thrown out.

INDIAN LANDS IN GEORGIA.

The House proceeded to consider the resolutions and amendments thereto, reported yesterday from the Committee of the Whole House on the report of the committee to whom was referred a motion of the 25th instant, respecting such persons as shall be assembled or embodied in arms, on any lands belonging to Indians out of the ordinary jurisdiction of any State, or of the territory of the United States South of the river Ohio: Whereupon,

The first resolution being read, in the words following, to wit:

"Resolved, That all persons who, unauthorized by law, and with hostile intent, may be found in arms on any lands allotted or secured to the Indians by treaties between the United States and any Indian tribes, shall, on conviction thereof, forfeit a sum not exceeding dollars, and be imprisoned not exceeding months."

And the amendment thereto, reported by the Committee of the Whole House, to add to the end thereof the words, "unless it shall be in immediate pursuit of Indians who shall have recently committed hostilities."

When the question was about to be taken on it, Mr. VENABLE rose, and pointed out the difference of opinion between two gentlemen who were both opposed to his amendment. One of them [Mr. Sedgewick] had maintained that, when individual Indians, unauthorized by the rest of their tribe, crossed the line and committed depredations, a settler was, by the law of nations, authorized to pursue them across the line and to retaliate, and that this was implied in the bill. Mr. Hillhouse had materially differed from him, and agreed with Mr. VENABLE, in supposing that the person so pursuing across the line was punishable by the resolution as it stood, without the amendment. He then reminded the House that this frontier line was perhaps fifteen hundred miles long. The Indians may come over any part of it, while the citizens of the United States are not to be allowed to cross it one mile in pursuit. Even a man in pursuit of savages who may have carried off his wife and children, may be stopped. The amendment he regarded as essential. Military officers may judge on the spot whether such persons whom they meet beyond the line, in pursuit of Indians, are within the sense of the act or not.

Mr. Ames denied that the resolution as it first stood took away the right of a man to pursue the Indians in order to recover his wife and children. But the amendment of Mr. VENABLE went to legalize all those acts of violence and revenge, that, for a century past, have deluged the frontier with blood.

Mr. LYMAN vindicated the inhabitants of the frontier. If the Indians are so unfortunate as to be the dupes of other nations, (viz: the Spaniards and British,) that is not our fault. The frontier people, from time to time, have done every thing in their power to keep them in peace.

Mr. Hillhouse opposed the amendment.

FEBRUARY, 1795.]

Indian Lands in Georgia.

[H. or R.]

Mr. McDowell said, that weekly and daily murders were committed by the Creeks in the district of Mero and in the Southwestern Territory. Do the United States avenge these murders? No. Do they demand back the property carried off? No. Instead of any satisfaction to the people, their characters are abused on this floor. The frontier people know that their happiness consists in peace, and, therefore, cultivate it as much as they can. He took a general view of the subject, and explained the insignificance of the posts as at present held by the troops of the United States for any purpose of protection. He noticed the inveterate hatred of the Indians against the whites, and their innate thirst of blood.

Mr. Moore went on the same grounds.

Mr. Giles did not like the harsh style assumed by some gentlemen in speaking of the frontier settlers. An hundred years hence these people would preponderate over this part of the Continent. He represented an Atlantic part of the Union, but, at the same time, he would carefully avoid any thing that might offend the Western people. The first settlers in this country were, when they first landed, frontier settlers. For his own part, he believed that the war between the whites and the Indians would be eternal. He said, that, from some intelligence received this day, there was reason to believe that a war with the Creeks might soon be expected.

Mr. Wadsworth.—Gentlemen have a great disposition to husband our little time, and I need not mention their manner of doing it. He said that he was willing to grant protection to the frontiers, but not to give leave, as by the amendment proposed, for an eternal war. He thought it calculated to drive the gentlemen on each side of this question into such opposite extremes, that they would never meet again upon the subject. He was willing to grant any degree of protection, but nothing for conquest. He said that the ancestors of the people now in the Atlantic part of the country were once frontier people, and he believed them to have been neither worse nor better than the present settlers, who are in the same situation. We are told of murders and robberies committed by the Indians; but the accounts of some of the officers employed by Government vary a little from this, and give room to suspect that there may be some error on both sides. He did not believe that this amendment would pass; but, if it should do so, it would widen the difference of opinion in the House.

Mr. PAGES was for the amendment.

Mr. CARSES could not conceive the reason why all regulations made in this House were for Indians only, as if the whites were constantly the aggressors. He asked if the Creeks performed a single title of the treaty of New York, about which there had been so much parade? No. The only design of Indians in making a peace is to get presents, for these they always get. As soon as these are spent they commit a new set of murders, in the hopes of another treaty. Thus they always have gone on, and always will go on, from murders to treaties, and from treaties to murders. Mr. C. complained that a gentleman from Maryland [Mr. Murray] had some days ago called the frontier people semi-savages. He hoped that such an expression would never again be used in that House. As to the treaty of New York, he might be told that the Creeks restored a number of women and children. He knew that; but he also knew that, before they did so, the relations of those people were obliged to put their hands in their pockets and pay large sums for their redemption, as the prisoners would not have been delivered up in consequence of the treaty of New York. This bill, without the amendment of Mr. VENABLE, would be an encouragement to the savages to come over the line and murder with impunity.

Mr. Scott was entirely in favor of the amendment. If the resolution passes without the amendment houses will soon be smoking and blood running. He believed that the subject in question was beyond the reach of human wisdom to regulate. He thought that striking out the amendment would only encourage the Indians to come in a body across the line. This they were never afraid of doing. The only thing which they feared was a pursuit, and this was to be effectually prevented by striking out the amendment. Was there ever such a thing heard of before as that, when the savages have carried off a man's wife and children, he must not be at liberty to pursue them? It would be the most frightful thing imaginable for the House to pass a law declaring such a pursuit criminal. Mr. S. could figure a case where the farm of a settler might come close to the Indian line, and the Indians might stand on the other side of the line and shoot him, and his neighbors would not be at liberty to pursue the murderer. Mr. S. said, that in that part of the country where he resided (Washington county) nothing of this kind was to be feared, as the line was at a sufficient distance from the cultivated lands, but there were other places on the frontier of the United States where this might happen. He said that no Christian nation had a right to ask better terms than this amendment offered to the savages. Stay upon your own side of the line and you are safe, but, if you cross over to us, we shall cross over in pursuit of you. This was fair play. If the resolution passed without the amendment, Mr. S. said that the Indians would immediately encamp close on their side of the line, and lie in watch there for whole months together, till they found a safe opportunity of crossing.

Mr. MURRAY said, he would make a remark or two on the criticism of the gentleman from Georgia, who had felt affected by an expression of his a few days since, when he called some of the people of the frontier "semi-savages." He did so, and he felt the expression not inapplicable. He confined the import of this expression exclusively to those upon the frontier who lead an unsavory life—who press forward into the deeper wilderness, by the new waves of advancing population, and live the life of savages without their virtues. He begged leave to call the gentleman's attention to a declaration of his own last session, to justify this expression, which he used more to designate a peculiar than a general character of the people in the region to which he applied it. The gentleman said, he did not value the lives of one hundred Indians as much as the life of one white man, or words to that extent. [This was in a debate just before the close of the last session. The words of Mr. CARNES were, "I would not give the life of one white man for that of fifty Indians."] Mr. MURRAY said, he had two points always in his view when the frontier was a subject in that House—protection to the frontier against the hostility of the Indians, and restraint upon the whites to prevent the occasions of war against the savages. He had given every testimony to the first by supporting every measure for their defence; that he represented a district perfectly beyond the danger of the Indians, was proof that he was actuated in his votes for appropriation and force by no other motive than that which belonged to every man there who supported the great principle of Government, that the whole must protect the parts. He wished to see such a system established, combining these two points, as would give complete protection against the Indians, and yet restrain the whites from violating peace. He wished to see the day when the arms of the Government might, without a crime, strike a whole tribe, if that tribe or its members waged war on the frontiers. But, to do this, it was necessary to place our relative situation so as that justice might be secured. He wished to adopt a regulation like the present, to prevent our fellow-citizens from the gratification of private revenge, the source from whence so much blood is shed. In order to justify exemplary punishment on Indian tribes, you must first be in a situation to restrain the whites from doing injustice to them. You must do what all nations have done, when, from the general or local state of civilization, private war disturbs public tranquility—you must restrain the right of private war, by placing the power of vengeance out of the reach of individuals, and in the hands of Government. Nor did this idea go at all to restrain that unalienable right of resistance against imminent danger, which was sanctioned by the law of nature. The picture drawn by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SCOTT.] with his accustomed ability and force, was certainly an interesting one—were an encampment of Indians to be heard in the woods near a settlement, after any evidence of hostility, he did not doubt but the neighbors would be perfectly justifiable in changing the scene of blood from the cottage to the camp—if the amendment which actually arms all the passions of revenge with the rights of law, be rejected, you will attain one of the great objects of frontier policy—the ability to restrain the right of private war, from which public war arises as a consequence. The Government will, when this ability to restrain is complete, become responsible for the protection of the whites against the savages. Until that is accomplished, he did not believe Government could, either in justice or policy, expend treasure or use force, when uncertain of the justice of the cause. He therefore hoped that the amendment would be rejected. Mr. FINDLEY was for the amendment, and mentioned several examples to prove the cruelty and perfidy of the Indians. The amendment itself was in these words: "Unless it shall be in immediate pursuit of the Indians who have recently committed hostilities." Mr. MADISON did not think the question explicit; he, therefore, proposed another, which was to prevent the pursuers from coming within a certain number of miles of an Indian town. He was extremely doubtful whether his amendment or any other would effectually answer the end proposed. He was convinced that no law of any kind would be able to hinder people from crossing the line in pursuit of Indians, who might have carried off their families. Mr. HARPER said, that however little time the House had to spare, and however long the discussion might have been, he could not help trespassing on their patience for a short time to deliver his sentiments, as he thought himself tolerably acquainted with the subject. He expressly denied that the Indians ever committed any murder without previous provocation. The process is shortly this: An Indian crosses the line and steals a horse. And as long as Indians exist they will always steal horses. The man to whom the horse belonged collects as many of his neighbors as he thinks sufficient, pursues the Indian, and not contented with recovering his horse, he kills the thief. The Indians, who have no such sacred ideas of property, immediately come over the line, and in revenge murder a number of innocent people. Indian murders are not unprovoked. They are not of that stamp. Mr. H. considered the amendment of Mr. VENABLE as a source of endless confusion. Any man, if it passed, might cross the Indian line as often as he thought proper, and say that he was in pursuit of Indians with prisoners. I undertake, (said he,) if you will give me an hundred dollars, to go to the frontier and get a witness who will come into a Court of Justice and swear that on such a day ten Indians came over the line in arms. Mr. H. said he was personally acquainted with the frontiers. He had a high respect for the inhabitants, there were many very worthy people among them, but likewise many others of a very different kind. This amendment will set open a door to all sorts of fraud and mischief. Mr. H. honored the sentiments of patriotism that gave rise to it, but he could not possibly agree to the propriety of its insertion.

Mr. WHITE, the member from the Southwestern Territory, said, that he had to complain of the slaughter of near four hundred citizens under the auspices of your Government. He felt himself much affected, and as to the doctrine of Indian killing, only in retaliation, he denied it altogether. The love of blood was hereditary in them. When the gentleman says that with an hundred dollars in his pocket, he can find ten men on the frontiers—[Mr. HARPER explained, that he only said he could find a witness.] Well, (said Mr. W.) if the gentleman did not mean a reflection on the frontiers, he meant nothing at all. I know not how well the gentleman may be practised in the arts of subornation, but I myself know of no such man. [Mr. HARPER—I expected the gentleman would confine himself to a decent answer.] Mr. W. proceeded to observe that no man acquainted with the frontiers would have made any such assertion as the gentleman had done. He was likewise extremely surprised at the gentleman from Maryland, for having persisted in affirming that many of the frontier people were semi-savages.

The yeas and nays were now taken on the amendment, which was lost by a majority of 7—yeas 39, nays 46, as follows:

YEAS.—James Armstrong, Theodoras Bailey, Abraham Baldwin, Thomas Blount, Thomas P. Carnes, Gabriel Christie, Thomas Claiborne, William J. Dawson, George Dent, Samuel Dexter, Gabriel Duval, Benjamin Edwards, William Findley, Christopher Greenup, William B. Grove, George Hancock, Carter B. Harrison, John Heath, William Irvine, Matthew Locke, William Lyman, Nathaniel Macon, Joseph McDowell, Alexander Melane, William Montgomery, Andrew Moore, Peter Muhlenberg, Joseph Neville, Anthony New, Alexander D. Orr, John Page, Thomas Scott, John Smilie, Thomas Sprigg, Thomas Tredwell, Philip Van Cortlandt, Abraham Venable, Francis Walker, Richard Winn, and Joseph Winston.

NAYS.—Fisher Ames, John Beatty, Elias Boudinot, Shearshub Bourne, Benjamin Bourne, Lambert Cadwalader, David Cobb, Peleg Coffin, Joshua Coit, Henry Dearborn, Thomas Fitzsimons, Dwight Foster, Ezekiel Gilbert, Nicholas Gilman, Henry Glenn, Benjamin Goodhue, James Gordon, Robert Goodloe Harper, James Hillhouse, William Hindman, Samuel Holten, John Hunter, Aaron Kitchell, John Wilkes Kittern, Amasa Learned, James Madison, Francis Malbone, William Vans Murray, Nathaniel Niles, Andrew Pickens, Theodore Sedgwick, John S. Sherburne, Jeremiah Smith, Israel Smith, William Smith, Zephaniah Swift, George Thatcher, Uriah Tracy, Jonathan Trumbull, John E. Van Allen, Peter Van Gaabeck, Peleg Wadsworth, Jeremiah Wadsworth, John Watta, Benjamin Williams, and Paine Wingate.

Mr. GILES, who had been in the House during the whole debate, had gone out just before the question was put, and returning immediately after the names had been called, asked leave to vote. The rule of the House was read by the SPEAKER, which is, that no member shall vote who was not present at putting of the question. Mr. G. on this account was not allowed to vote.

Mr. CARNES then moved to amend the said resolution by adding to the end thereof the following words:

"Unless it shall be in continuation of a pursuit to a distance not exceeding ——— miles beyond the line of the particular Indians who shall have recently committed murder, or may be carrying off captives or plunder."

It was resolved in the affirmative.

The said resolution, as amended, was then again read, and agreed to by the House, as follows:

Resolved, That all persons who, unauthorized by law, and with hostile intent, may be found in arms on any lands allotted or secured to the Indians by treaties between the United States and any Indian tribes, shall, on conviction thereof, forfeit a sum not exceeding ——— dollars, and be imprisoned not exceeding ——— months, unless it shall be in continuation of a pursuit to a distance not exceeding ——— miles beyond the line of the particular Indians who shall have recently committed murder, or may be carrying off captives or plunder.

The second resolution being again read, and amended, was, on the question put thereupon, agreed to by the House, as follows:

Resolved, That it shall be lawful for the military force of the United States to apprehend every person or persons found in arms as aforesaid, and him or them to convey to the civil authority of the United States within some one of the States, who shall, by such authority, be secured to be tried in manner and form as is provided in and by the act, entitled "An act to regulate trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes." Provided, That no person shall be confined, after his arrest, and before his removal, more than ——— days.

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in pursuant to the said resolutions, and that Mr. SEDGWICK, Mr. MADISON, and Mr. HILLHOUSE, do prepare and bring in the same.

PUBLIC DEBT.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill, entitled "An act making further provision for the support of Public Credit, and for the redemption of the Public Debt," with amendments; to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

The House proceeded to consider the said amendments; and the same being read,

A motion was made to strike out the section proposing an additional half per centum to the holders of the Foreign Debt, if they should subscribe the same to the Domestic Debt, so as to make the principal and interest payable at the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. HEISTER observed, that he should vote for striking out that section; that doing so would not derange the other parts of the bill, as every other provision in it would be complete without this section. He was anxious to have it stricken out, because he conceived it was making a most important change in the system of our Debt, a change which, if by experience we should find injurious, it would be out of our power to remedy. He confessed there was an inconvenience and expense in remitting such large sums as the interest of our Foreign Debt and instalments to Europe; but asked, if that inconvenience would be remedied by paying at the Treasury of the United States, and whether subscribing it here really made it Domestic Debt? If it did, he should think it well worth half a per centum in addition to the present rate of interest; but that, he said, would not be the case; the money was still owned in Europe, and must go there, remit it who will, and therefore he conceived that the effect of the proposed alteration in the Debt would be no other than this: that instead of the United States remitting upon the best possible terms they can, a private concern in Europe would be enabled to remit as they pleased, and for which they would be well paid; for one-half per cent. added to the present interest, is according to the different loans, from ten to twelve-and-a-half per cent. on the gross sums to be remitted; and that in times of peace they might remit specie at an expense of two-and-a-half per cent. and make a profit of from seven to ten per cent. Why, said he, cannot our own Treasury Department make this remittance, and save the difference, when it may be convenient to ship money, and that of this we ought always to be able to judge ourselves?

He did not, however, dread this as the greatest evil; he found a greater to both the agricultural and mercantile interests of the country.

It was, he said, well known that a single concern (he meant the Wilinks, Van Staphorst, &c., merchants of Amsterdam) were the directors of the chief of our loans in Europe, and that the interest they had to receive upon the Foreign Debt alone amounted to between five and six hundred thousand dollars annually; and that besides this they were the directors of very large purchases made, and perhaps still making, of our Domestic Debt, which they had organized, and now conducted in the nature of a bank, so that we could not in either case, expect the subscriptions of individual holders of our Debt, and that consequently this would be no inducement for them to remove here. If, therefore, that Debt was subscribed at all, it would be by these directors. He believed that the command of such enormous sums of money to be received by a single house annually from this country, would be dangerous to our trade; for, by the bare dread of our banks and moneyed institutions where the public money is kept, that these sums might be drawn out for exportation, they would be obliged to narrow their discounts, so as very much to restrain our exporters in their purchases and prices. He confessed he did not believe it would injure the Middle States, whose produce would find a market in the West Indies, as well as in Europe, as much as it would those States whose rice and tobacco solely depended on the European market, and was more an object for remittance. For if the agents of those gentlemen should make a point of keeping down the price of the articles they wanted to purchase, that might be effected by drawing largely on the Treasury, so as to produce a scarcity of cash at the time of their coming to market. This, he believed himself, might be expected from people who do everything by calculation. For, as the interest is to be paid to the individual money-lender in Holland but once a year, and by this plan it is to be paid here quarterly, the remittance may be made to the directors in good time, either in specie, produce, or bills, at the pleasure of the receivers; that, although it might cost the Treasury, as had been stated, near ten per cent. to remit bills, it ought to be considered that when the merchant sells his bills high, it enters into the price of the articles he purchases, so that what is lost to the Treasury is got by the seller of the produce: that these reasons induced him to hope the motion to strike out the section would prevail.

The motion was withdrawn. After some discussion, the amendments were agreed to, with an additional amendment upon those of the Senate.

INTERCOURSE WITH FOREIGN NATIONS.

The following confidential Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

Gentlemen of the Senate, and of the House of Representatives:

In my first communication to Congress, during their present session, I gave them reason to expect that "certain circumstances of our intercourse with foreign nations" would be transmitted to them. There was, at that time, every assurance for believing that some of the most important of our foreign affairs would have been concluded, and others considerably matured, before they should rise. But, notwithstanding I have waited until this moment, it has so happened that, either from causes unknown to me, or from events which could not be controlled, I am yet unable to execute my original intention. That I may, however, fulfill the expectation given, as far as the actual situation of things will in my judgment permit, I now, in confidence, lay before Congress the following general statement.

Our Minister near the French Republic has urged compensation for the injuries which our commerce has sustained from captures by French cruisers, from the non-fulfilment of the contracts of the agents of the Republic with our citizens, and from the embargo at Bordeaux. He had also pressed an allowance for the money voted by Congress, for relieving the inhabitants of St. Domingo. It affords me the highest pleasure to inform Congress that perfect harmony reigns between the two Republics, and that those claims are in a train of being discussed with candor, and of being amicably adjusted. So much of our relation to Great Britain may depend upon the result of our late negotiations in London, that, until that result shall arrive, I cannot undertake to make any communication upon this subject.

After the negotiation with Spain had been long depending, unusual and unexpected embarrassments were raised to interrupt its progress. But the Commissioner of His Catholic Majesty, near the United States, having declared to the Secretary of State, that if a particular accommodation should be made in the conducting of the business, no further delay would ensue, I thought proper, under all circumstances, to send to His Catholic Majesty, an Envoy Extraordinary, especially charged to bring to a conclusion the discussions which have been formerly announced to Congress.

The friendship of Her Most Faithful Majesty has been often manifested in checking the passage of the Algerine corsairs into the Atlantic Ocean. She has also furnished occasional convoys to the vessels of the United States, even when bound to other ports than her own. We may therefore promise ourselves, that as, in the ordinary course of things, few causes can exist for dissatisfaction between the United States and Portugal, so the temper with which accidental difficulties will be met on each side, will speedily remove them.

Between the Executive of the United States and the Government of the United Netherlands, but little intercourse has taken place during the last year. It may be acceptable to Congress to learn that our credit in Holland is represented as standing upon the most respectable footing.

Upon the death of the late Emperor of Morocco an agent was despatched to renew, with his successor, the treaty which the United States had made with him. The agent unfortunately died, after he had reached Europe, in the prosecution of his mission. But, until lately, it was impossible to determine, with any degree of probability, who of the competitors for that empire would be ultimately fixed in the supreme power. Although the measures which have been since adopted for the renewal of the treaty, have been obstructed by the disturbed situation of Amsterdam, there are good grounds for presuming, as yet, upon the pacific disposition of the Emperor in fact, towards the United States, and that the past miscarriage will be shortly remedied. Congress are already acquainted with the failure of the Loan attempted in Holland, for the relief of our unhappy fellow-citizens in Algiers. This subject, than which none deserves a more affectionate zeal, has constantly commanded my best exertions. I am happy, therefore, in being able to say, that, from the last authentic accounts, the Day was disposed to treat for a peace and ransom, and that both would, in all probability, have been accomplished, had we not been disappointed in the means. Nothing which depends upon the Executive shall be left undone, for carrying into immediate effect the supplementary act of Congress.

G. WASHINGTON.

UNITED STATES, February 28, 1795.

The Message was read, and ordered to lie for consideration.

MONDAY, March 2.

An engrossed bill supplementary to the act, entitled "An act to regulate trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes," was read the third time, amended, and passed.

A message was received from the Senate, disagreeing to the amendment of the House of Representatives, on the bill for the support of Public Credit and the redemption of the Public Debt. The Senate receded from their own amendments at the same time, so that the bill stands as it was originally agreed to.

Mr. TRACY, from the Committee of Claims, presented, according to order, a bill authorizing and directing the Secretary of War to place certain persons, therein named on the pension list; which was read twice, and ordered to be engrossed and read the third time to-day.

Mr. BENJAMIN BOURNE, from the Committee to whom was committed the bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act to amend the second section of the act for erecting a lighted beacon on Shellencastle Island, in the harbor of Ocracoke, in the State of North Carolina," made a report, which was read. Whereupon,

Resolved, That the said bill be rejected.

The House then went into a Committee on the bill authorizing the President to obtain the cession of certain lands in the State of Georgia.

After the bill had been partly read, it was observed by Mr. BLOUNT, that this was not the one which had been moved for. The bill which had been wanted was then taken up, and it was that, "making conditional provision for the expenses of a treaty with certain Indian tribes." This was the bill respecting the back lands of South Carolina. It was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading. The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from the Secretary of War, enclosing extracts of letters and documents from Major General Wayne, and from James Seagrove, agent of Indian affairs for the Creek nation; which were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. TRACY from the Committee of Claims, to whom were referred sundry reports of the Secretary of War, accompanying statements in the cases of claimants to be placed on the list of pensioners, returned to the War Office by the Judges of the District Courts of the United States, made a report; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. GILES, from the committee to whom were referred the Letter from the Secretary of the Treasury of the twenty-fifth ultimo, enclosing a statement exhibiting the number of officers employed in the management of the revenue from stills and spirits distilled within the United States; as also a Letter from the Commissioner of the Revenue on the subject of compensation to the said officers, made a report; which was read. Whereupon,

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to lay before the next Congress such a statement of the internal revenues as will ascertain, with precision, the nett product thereof, and the expense of collection; and that he also report a list of all the officers employed in that service, and the compensations allowed to each of them.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the resolution sent from the Senate, authorizing the exportation of arms, cannon, and military stores, in certain cases; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose, and reported the said resolution, with an amendment; which was twice read, and agreed to by the House. The said resolution, with the amendment, was then read the third time and passed.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

Gentlemen of the Senate, and of the House of Representatives:

It appears, from information which I have lately received, that it may be probably necessary to the more successful conduct of our affairs on the coast of Barbary, that one Consul should reside in Morocco, another in Algiers, and a third in Tunis or Tripoli. As no appointment for these offices will be accepted without some emolument annexed, I submit to the consideration of Congress whether it may not be advisable to authorize a stipend to be allowed to two Consuls for that coast in addition to the one already existing.

G. WASHINGTON.

UNITED STATES, March 2, 1795.

The said Message was read, and ordered to be referred to Mr. SEDGWICK, Mr. BOURNOR, and Mr. PARKER; that they do examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their opinion thereupon, to the House.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act to regulate the compensation of clerks;" and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported the bill with an amendment; which was twice read, and agreed to by the House. The said bill, with the amendment, was then read the third time and passed.

A Message was received from the President of the United States, with copies of a Letter from the Governor of the State of Delaware, and of an Act, enclosed, "declaring the assent of that State to an amendment therein mentioned to the Constitution of the United States." The said Message and papers were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill, entitled "An act for continuing and regulating the Military Establishment of the United States, and for repealing sundry acts heretofore passed on that subject," with sundry amendments; to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

The House proceeded to consider the said amendments, and the same being read were agreed to.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from the Treasurer of the United States, accompanying his account of receipts and expenditures for the War Department, from the first day of September to the thirty-first day of December, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-four, inclusive; which were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. SEDGWICK, from the Committee to whom was referred the Message from the President of the United States of this day respecting the appointment of Consuls, made a report; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill, entitled "An act for the more effectual recovery of debts due from individuals to the United States," with several amendments; to which they desire the concurrence of this House. The Senate have disagreed to the amendment proposed by this House to the resolution "authorizing the exportation of arms, cannon, and military stores in certain cases."

The House proceeded to consider the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act for the more effectual recovery of debts due from individuals to the United States," and the same being read, were agreed to.

An engrossed bill laying duties on carriages for the conveyance of persons, and repealing the former act for that purpose, was read the third time, and passed.

Ordered, That the Letter and report from the Secretary of War of the twenty-eighth ultimo accompanying a further statement in the cases of claimants to be placed on the list of pensioners, which lay on the table, be referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. SWIRT, from the committee to whom was committed the bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act to authorize a grant of lands to the French inhabitants of Gallipolis, and for other purposes therein mentioned," reported that the Committee had had the said bill under consideration, and made no amendment thereto. The bill was read the third time, and passed.

DUTY ON CARRIAGES.

The House next went into a Committee on the bill for repealing the act laying duties on carriages for persons.

Mr. BOURNE proposed, as an amendment, that no carriage should be taxed that is not worth twenty-five dollars.

Mr. FITZSIMONS was against introducing amendments in the present situation of the House, when, if a gentleman really had objections to a bill, he cannot be heard. He did not like to leave it to the discretion of collectors, who, perhaps, never saw a carriage before, to put a value upon one. He wished the matter to stand as it is for the present, till there can be further experience. This amendment was rejected.

The Committee then rose and reported; and the House went through the bill, which was ordered to be engrossed, for a third reading.

INTERCOURSE WITH THE INDIANS.

Mr. FITZSIMONS brought in and read a resolution, that the President be authorized to buy goods, this season, for supporting an intercourse with the Indians.

Letters were then called for and read, from General Wayne, and from Mr. Seagrave, agent, among the Creek Indians. The latter, in strong terms, recommended that something of this kind should be done. It was observed in one of his letters that Spaniards do everything in their power to stir up the Indians to mischief.

Mr. MORTIMER hoped that so much would be done as might serve to put the matter on a footing of experiment. He wished that the President might be trusted in the meantime with it, and then the next Congress will be better able to judge. If the Indians go to the British to buy goods, they will still be under British influence. It is as clear as a sunbeam that the establishment of a trade must be the foundation of amity. A bill was ordered to be brought in.

EXPORTATION OF ARMS.

The House proceeded to consider their amendment disagreed to by the Senate to the resolution authorizing the exportation of arms, cannon, and military stores in certain cases connected with the commercial interests of the United States, and for public purposes only. There was added a proviso, that there should be none sent to the Dominions or Territories of any of the European powers now at war.

Mr. DAYTON moved to strike out this proviso. Mr. SEDGWICK thought that it was a proper one, but he was not at liberty to speak fully on this subject. He feared that if this proviso was not inserted, the House might be involved in a quarrel with some of the belligerent Powers.

Mr. GILES thought that the proviso would put the House into a situation laughable enough. The law that prohibits the exportation of arms expires in June next. Now, if it is necessary to put this proviso into the present bill, for fear of offending foreign nations, it will also be necessary to prolong that act, or otherwise it may be still said that we violate the neutrality. There is no design of prolonging the act, and for that reason it is needless to insert the proviso.

Mr. MADISON was of opinion, with his colleague, [Mr. GILES,] that the proviso would "narrow our national rights." Besides, even the passing of the proviso is worth nothing, for we may send military stores to Hamburg, and from thence they may be transported to any of the nations at war.

Mr. GOODRICH saw this matter in a particular light. This exportation was Governmental, and, if a man-of-war meets this vessel, the proviso will prevent any jealousy.

A motion for striking it out was carried—Ayes 35, noes 30.

The Committee then rose, and reported. The question on the amendment was put.

Mr. B. BOURNE hoped that this amendment would not be agreed to. It might have serious consequences.

Mr. SEDGWICK.—If the amendment itself has any meaning, it is authorizing the President to send military stores to nations at war.

Mr. GILES did not see the use of so much delicacy. The military stores are for a nation that is actually at war, and that, as Mr. G. believed, always will be at war.

The amendment was carried. It was then moved to strike out the word "resolved," and to put into its place, "be it enacted." This was agreed to. The resolution was thus turned into a bill.

Mr. HARPER again moved to get into a Committee of the Whole, on the report of the select committee as to surveying the coasts.

The motion was negatived.

INVALID PENSION BILL.

The bill empowering the Secretary of War to place certain persons therein named on the invalid pension list, was read a third time, and passed.

Mr. CHAMBERS was against the immediate passing of this bill, as he could not be certain, from want of time to examine it, whether all the persons named in it, were entitled to a pension.

Mr. TRACY noticed that he had sat up late for several nights in order to bring it to a completion; and was anxious that it should pass. He mentioned this attention not to claim any merit from having done his duty, but to show that the bill had really been considered. It was mentioned by another member, that some invalids, who were highly meritorious, had been omitted, and that, therefore, it would be better to defer the bill till next session, when these might be included.

Mr. FITZSIMONS said, that not to pass this bill would be the greatest disgrace that ever befell the House. The poor people had waited year after year, and at last, when it was ready to pass, their claims were postponed for another nine months certain, and nobody could tell how much longer.

And then, upon a motion made and seconded, the House adjourned until seven o'clock P. M.

SEVEN O'CLOCK, P. M., MONDAY, MARCH 2.

Mr. DEARBORN, from the committee to whom was referred the petition of the merchants and mariners of Wiscasset, in the State of Massachusetts, made a report; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

A message was received from the Senate, notifying that they had receded from their amendment, as to the bill for the exportation of arms.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill, entitled "An act to alter and amend the act entitled 'An act laying certain duties upon snuff and refined sugar,' with several amendments; to which they desire the concurrence of this House."

The House proceeded to consider the said amendments, and the same being read, were agreed to.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill, entitled "An act for the more general promulgation of the laws of the United States," with several amendments; to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

The House proceeded to consider the said amendments, and the same being read, were agreed to.

CESSION OF GEORGIA LANDS.

It was then moved that the House should go into a Committee, on the bill to authorize the President to obtain the cession of certain Territories in Georgia, which was agreed to.

Mr. SEDGWICK moved that the House rise and report the bill.

Mr. FITZSIMONS wanted to know the meaning of the words in the bill, "by purchase, or otherwise." If the President is to buy the right from the State of Georgia to the lands which they claim, we ought to make provision for it. What is the meaning of the words?

Mr. SWIRT said, that this bill for the Georgia lands was an unlimited thing. No man had a higher opinion than himself of the President, but it was improper to grant such extensive powers. The House think the State of Georgia wrong in having claimed this land. It will be still more extraordinary in us to propose to buy what they have not a right to sell. We ought to declare at once, that the lands belong to the United States, and not to give any such indefinite power which might offend our constituents. He was ready to allow the Georgians payment of any expense which they might have been at in defending it from the Indians, and nothing else.

Mr. AMES imagined that it would require a wheelbarrow load of documents and papers to determine whether these lands were the property of the State of Georgia, or not. In the last night but one of a session, there was not time for entering into the discussion of the right. He thought it would be good policy to agree to the resolution

There was, however, an interim danger of persons who claim the lands going and taking them by force, and thus bringing the United States into another war ten times more bloody than the present. He should deplore the disappointment, if the bill did not pass.

Mr. SPOONWICK had an amendment which was for empowering the President to give — dollars for the session.

Mr. HARRIS imagined that to fill up the blank, would be attended with insuperable difficulties. It would be much better to let it stand as it was. To fix the price before you attempt to make the bargain, is quite wrong. We have not information sufficient to know what sum it will be prudent to give. We cannot at this time, appoint a committee to inquire. He advised to refer it to the Secretary of the Treasury to report to next Congress. The fixing a price would be destroying the responsibility of the Executive. He might shelter himself under a vote of the House as having fixed the sum. He was satisfied that the Executive has abundance of reasons for trying to make the bargain as cheaply as he can, but this resolution would destroy the principle of responsibility. We had been told that the Georgians have not a right to these lands, and therefore that it was improper to attempt a purchase from them. In the second place, that, if we had acquired such a right, it would be useless, because we have too much land already. With regard to the former, Mr. H. went into a long historical detail to prove that Georgia actually has a right to the lands in question. He wished that the land did belong to the United States, and wished that it might be bought. We are not to suppose this a mere visionary claim. It is a legal claim, and extends over thirty millions of acres of the finest lands in the world, and most admirably situated both for commerce and emigration. It might, every foot of it, be made worth half a dollar, or a dollar, per acre. Its settlement would tend to open the navigation of the Mississippi. These thirty millions of acres have been sold to certain adventuring companies, at five hundred thousand dollars. If the purchasers themselves had completed their rights, he would advise the repurchase from them.

Mr. DARRON liked the amendment better than the original resolution. He proposed an amendment which was not distinctly heard. He was sensible of the value of time. The Senate are waiting for the resolution of this House. He said that, in this bill, there had been omitted a tract of land, forty miles square, formerly purchased from the Natchez. He feared that this affair might involve the States in a war with the Creeks, the most formidable tribe of the Indians.

Mr. SPOONWICK said, that his amendment had been amended. We understood that it now included the tract of forty miles square, purchased from the Natchez.

Mr. McDOWELL hoped that the bill would not pass at all. It was a subject of so much intricacy that it could not be discussed at present. He did not think that it would be very honorable in the Government, if the sale was actually completed, to embarrass the purchasers of the lands, till they should be forced to give up their right.

Mr. FINLEY liked the resolution better without the amendment.

A member recommended not fixing any sum, but striking it out of the amendment. If the sum is too low, we shall not get the land. If too high, we may be sure that the State of Georgia will not part with it for one farthing less than the whole sum mentioned in the bill. No gentleman can, at present, guess what the land is worth.

Mr. BONDURON was for limiting the question might be taken.

Mr. McDOWELL moved that the Committee rise, as they had not sufficient information for proceeding. The motion was negatived.

The amendment of — dollars was finally rejected. The bill was reported to the House with amendments—agreed to, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The yeas and nays were then taken, and stood—yeas 41, nays 24, as follows:

YEAS.—Fisher Ames, Theodorius Bailey, Abraham Baldwin, Lemuel Benton, Thomas P. Carnes, David Cobb, Peleg Coffin, William J. Dawson, George Dent, Samuel Dexter, Gabriel Duvall, William Findley, Thomas Fitzsimons, Dwight Foster, Ezekiel Gilbert, James Gordon, Daniel Heister, William Hindman, Samuel Holten, John Hunter, William Irvine, John Wilkes Kitters, Amasa Learned, Matthew Locke, Francis Malone, Andrew Moore, William Vans Murray, John Page, Andrew Pickens, Theodore Sedgwick, John S. Sherburne, John Smilie, Jeremiah Smith, William Smith, Thomas Sprigg, George Thatcher, Uriah Tracy, Jonathan Trumbull, Philip Van Cortlandt, Peleg Wadsworth, and John Watts.

NAYS.—Thomas Blount, Elias Boudinot, Lambert Cadwalader, Gabriel Christie, Thomas Claiborne, Joshua Coit, Jonathan Dayton, Christopher Greenup, William B. Grove, Carter B. Harrison, Robert Goodloe Harper, James Hillhouse, Aaron Kitchell, William Lyman, Nathaniel Macon, James Madison, Joseph McDowell, Alexander Mebane, Nathaniel Niles, Israel Smith, Ze-phaniah Swift, Thomas Tredwell, Paine Wingate, and Joseph Winston.

PROMULGATION OF THE LAWS.

The House then went into a Committee on the petition of Edmund Hogan, and the report of the select committee was read.

Mr. W. SMITH said, that the mere promulgation of the laws was not sufficient. It was proper that the speeches also should be printed. Something in this way had been attempted by the printers of newspapers in this city. Mr. S. had neither inclination nor occasion to cast reflections on any of the persons appointed to take the debates. But there had been considerable discontents in various parts of the Union on this account, from misrepresentations contained in the newspapers. There was a strong necessity for more accuracy. The statements had been extremely incorrect.

Mr. DARRON followed on the same ground. He said that the newspapers contained a torrent of abuse and misrepresentation, as to what passed in the House.

Mr. HILLHOUSE observed, that it would be trifling to direct any person skilled in stenography to apply to the Secretary of State, for the Secretary was not empowered to make any agreement with him; and after persons had put themselves to, perhaps, a great deal of trouble in applying, the House would, very likely, next session, refuse the scheme. It was wrong, therefore, to publish any invitation, till an establishment was actually made.

Mr. CLAIRBORNE said, that this would be an encyclopædia of printing—a thing, of which the House never would see an end. To this it was answered, that, as to the expense, the House might make themselves easy, for the printers of newspapers would be glad to get them to print by way of news.

Mr. GILBERT proposed, as an amendment, that the reporter should finish his debates every evening, and lay them before the House next morning; and that after the Clerk had read the minutes, the House should go into a Committee to correct the manuscript of the reporter.

The report as it stood was agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be requested to receive proposals from any person or persons skilled in the art of stenography, or capable of reporting debates with accuracy, and to report the same to this House, at the commencement of the next session, with his observations and opinion respecting the qualification of the said person or persons for the said duty, to the end that this House may be enabled to appoint one or more persons as officers of the House, for the valuable purpose above mentioned.

The Committee rose, and on a division of the House, there were—Yeas 28, nays 26.

The House then, at half past ten in the evening, adjourned till Tuesday.

TUESDAY, March 3.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill, entitled "An act supplementary to the act, entitled 'An act establishing a Mint, and regulating the coins of the United States,' with several amendments; to which they desire the concurrence of this House."

The House proceeded to consider the said amendments, and, the same being read, were agreed to.

Mr. TRACY, from the Committee of Claims, to whom were yesterday referred a Letter and Report from the Secretary of War, of the twentieth ultimo, accompanying a further statement in the cases of claimants to be placed on the list of pensioners, made a report; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The House proceeded to consider the report made yesterday by the Committee of Claims, to whom were referred sundry reports from the Secretary of War, accompanying statements in the cases of claimants to be placed on the list of pensioners; and the said report being amended, was agreed to by the House, as follows:

Resolved, That the return of invalid pensioners from the District of New Hampshire, by Samuel Tenney, William Parker, junior, and Ephraim Robinson, under a commission from John Sullivan, late Judge of the said District, which contains only an abstract of the testimony, be returned by the Secretary of War to the District Judge of New Hampshire, for the purpose of giving an opportunity to return the testimony respecting the invalids contained in the said report, according to the requisitions of law.

On motion,
Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to report to the House of Representatives, at the next session, a tariff of duties on goods, wares, and merchandise, imported into the United States, proportioned to the rates of duties now imposed by law, with his opinion on such other matters as may be necessary for the improvement of the revenue arising from impost and from distilled spirits and stills.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill, entitled "An act making provision for the purposes of treaty and act of trade with the Indians," with sundry amendments; to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

The House proceeded to consider the said amendments, and, the same being read, were agreed to.

Ordered, That the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union, to whom was referred so much of the Message from the President of the UNITED STATES, of the seventeenth ultimo, as relates to the communications from the Governor of the Territory of the United States South of the river Ohio, be discharged from the consideration of the same, and that it be recommended to Mr. FITZSIMONS, Mr. MADISON, and Mr. BLOUNT.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have postponed to the next session of Congress, the consideration of the bill, entitled "An act authorizing and directing the Secretary of War to place certain persons therein named on the pension list." The Senate have agreed to a resolution "relative to the title to certain lands situate in the Southwestern parts of the United States;" to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

The House proceeded to consider the said resolution, and, the same being read, as follows:

Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States be, and hereby is, requested to give directions to the Attorney General to collect, digest, and report to the Senate, the charters, treaties, and other documents, relative to, and explanatory of, the title to the land situate in the Southwestern parts of the United States, and claimed by certain companies, under a law of the State of Georgia, passed the seventh day of January last, namely: a tract of land claimed by James Gunn, Matthew McAllister, and George Walker, and their associates; also, a tract of land claimed by Nicholas Long, Thomas Glascock, Ambrose Gordon, and Thomas Cumming, and their associates; also, a tract of land claimed by John B. Scott, John C. Nightingale, and Wade Hampton, and their associates; and also, a tract of land claimed by Zachariah Cox and Matthias Maher, and their associates.

MARCH, 1795.]

Revision of the Laws—Thanks to the Speaker.

[H. or R.]

A motion was made and seconded, to amend the said resolution, by striking out, in the fifth line, the word "Senate," and inserting, in lieu thereof, the words "next Congress." And on the question thereupon, it was resolved in the affirmative.

The said resolution, as amended, was again read, and agreed to by the House.

REVISION OF THE LAWS.

Mr. DEXTER laid a resolution on the table nearly in the following words:

"Resolved, That a committee be appointed to consider and report on the propriety of revising the laws of the United States, inflicting capital and other infamous punishments, and of repealing the same in certain cases."

Mr. D. said, that he laid the resolution on the table, hoping that gentlemen would consider the subject as important enough to command some share of their attention during the recess. That the existing laws were so severe as to give impunity to some crimes in the Eastern States, that grand jurors would reluctantly present offenders, and even jurors on trial often acquit them improperly; that he had known a single instance in which an offender despised a trial from a confidence that no evidence could induce the jury to convict him. Mr. D. further observed, that he had long been convinced, that the present punishments were introduced when the rights of men were little understood, and less regarded; that they were unjust and barbarous in principle, and mischievous in practice, as it is not difficult to show that they have a direct tendency to produce the very crimes they are intended to prevent; and that justice, humanity, and even policy, call loudly for a reform. If reasoning should be distrusted, at least facts and actual experiment ought to convince: That such facts had long existed both in Europe and America, as to plate it beyond doubt, that savage laws will always make a savage people; that the change of things in Portugal, and particularly in Lisbon, which had lately taken place, was another proof in addition to many others; that the danger of assassination and robbery there had been well known, that the abolition of sanguinary punishments there lately had abolished the crimes; and that he had been informed by a most respectable gentleman just arrived from there that the midnight traveller is now as safe in Lisbon as in Philadelphia.

Mr. D. was not unacquainted with the fears of some very good men, that mitigating punishments would produce an inundation of crimes, especially in large cities; but he said experience had shown that no such danger existed; the best citizens of Portugal had objected from similar fears, but they had happily discovered that such fears were groundless. A Legislature ought to dare to do right, and trust events to Heaven. Moral good cannot produce natural evil as its ordinary fruit.

Mr. D. concluded by observing, that if he should not be a member of the next Congress, he hoped some gentleman would think the subject important enough to be attended to—at least he should have done his duty—and the resolution would show the opinion of one of the sovereign people, that the criminal code ought to be amended, and he doubted not that the future servants of the public would pay due respect to it.

Ordered, That the Transylvania Company, commonly called Richard Henderson and Company, who presented a memorial to this House on the sixth day of January last, have leave to withdraw the same.

Ordered, That a message be sent to the Senate to inform them that this House, having completed the business before them, are now about to adjourn without day; and that the Clerk of this House do go with the said message.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have appointed a committee, on their part, jointly, with such committee as may be appointed on the part of this House, to wait on the President of the United States, and inform him that Congress is ready to adjourn without day, unless he may have any further communications to make to them.

The House proceeded to consider the said message: Whereupon,

Resolved, That this House doth agree to the resolution of the Senate for the appointment of a Joint Committee of the two Houses, to wait on the President of the United States, and inform him of the intended recess of Congress; and that Mr. BOURNOR, Mr. SEDGWICK, and Mr. TRUMBULL, be of the committee appointed on the part of this House.

On a motion made and seconded,

"That the thanks of this House be presented to Frederick Augustus Muhlenberg, in testimony of their approbation of his conduct in discharging the arduous and important duties assigned him while in the Chair."

It was resolved unanimously: Whereupon, Mr. SPEAKER made his acknowledgments to the House in manner following:

"GENTLEMEN: I feel myself highly honored by this distinguished mark of your approbation of my conduct in the station you were pleased to assign unto me; and although I am conscious that my feeble efforts do not merit so precious a reward, yet permit me to assure you that it has made a lasting impression on my mind, and I shall ever esteem it with the most unfeigned satisfaction.

"Gentlemen, I sincerely thank you; may every happiness attend you; may you long continue to enjoy the confidence of your fellow-citizens; and may you meet with their just applause of having deserved well of your country."

Mr. BOURNOR, from the Joint Committee appointed to wait on the President of the United States and inform him of the intended recess of Congress, reported that the Committee had performed that service, and that the President signified to them that he had no further communication to make during the present session: Whereupon, Mr. SPEAKER adjourned the House sine die.

APPENDIX

TO THE HISTORY OF THE THIRD CONGRESS,

COMPRISING THE MOST IMPORTANT DOCUMENTS ORIGINATING DURING THAT CONGRESS, AND THE PUBLIC ACTS PASSED BY IT.

PROCLAMATION OF NEUTRALITY.

BY THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,

A PROCLAMATION.

Whereas it appears, that a state of war exists between Austria, Prussia, Sardinia, Great Britain, and the United Netherlands, on the one part; and France, on the other; and the duty and interest of the United States require, that they should with sincerity and good faith adopt and pursue a conduct friendly and impartial towards the belligerent Powers:

I have, therefore, thought fit, by these presents, to declare the disposition of the United States to observe the conduct aforesaid, towards those Powers respectively; and to exhort and warn the citizens of the United States carefully to avoid all acts and proceedings whatsoever, which may in any manner tend to contravene such disposition.

And I do hereby also make known, that whosoever of the citizens of the United States shall render himself liable to punishment or forfeiture under the Law of Nations by committing, aiding, or abetting, hostilities against any of the said Powers; or by carrying to any of them those articles which are deemed contraband by the modern usage of Nations, will not receive the protection of the United States, against such punishment or forfeiture; and further, that I have given instructions to those officers to whom it belongs, to cause prosecutions to be instituted against all persons who shall, within the cognizance of the Courts of the United States, violate the Law of Nations, with respect to the Powers at war, or any of them.

In testimony whereof, I have caused the seal of the United States of America to be affixed to these presents, and signed the same with my hand. Done at the City of Philadelphia, 22d day of April, 1793, and of the Independence of the United States of America the seventeenth.

G. WASHINGTON.

By the President:

T. JEFFERSON.

INSTRUCTIONS TO THE COLLECTORS OF THE CUSTOMS.

PHILADELPHIA, August 4, 1793.

SIR:—It appearing that repeated contraventions of our neutrality have taken place in the ports of the United States, without having been discovered in time for prevention or remedy, I have it in command from the President to address to the Collectors of the respective districts a particular instruction on the subject.

It is expected that the Officers of the Customs in each district will, in the course of their official functions, have a vigilant eye upon whatever may be passing within the ports, harbors, creeks, inlets, and waters, of such districts, of a nature to contravene the laws of neutrality, and, upon discovery of any thing of the kind, will give immediate notice to the Governor of the State, and to the attorney of the judicial district comprehending the district of the customs within which any such contravention may happen.

To assist the judgment of the officers on this head, I transmit herewith a schedule of rules concerning sundry particulars which have been adopted by the President, as deductions from the laws of neutrality, established and received among nations. Whatever shall be contrary to these rules will, of course, be to be notified as above mentioned.

There are some other points which, pursuant to our treaties, and the determination of the Executive, I ought to notice to you.

If any vessel of either of the Powers at war with France should bring or send within your district a prize made of the subjects, people, or property of France, it is immediately to be notified to the Governor of the State, in order that measures may be taken, pursuant to the 17th article of our treaty with France, to oblige such vessel and her prize, or such prize, when sent in without the capturing vessel, to depart.

No privateer of any of the Powers at war with France, coming within a district of the United States, can, by the 22d article of our treaty with Instructions to the Collectors of the Customs.

France, enjoy any other privilege than that of purchasing such victuals as shall be necessary for her going to the next port of the Prince or State from which she has her commission. If she should do any thing beside this, it is immediately to be reported to the Governor, and the attorney of the district. You will observe, by the rules transmitted, that the term privateer is understood not to extend to vessels armed for merchandise and war, commonly called with us letters of marque, nor, of course, to vessels of war in the immediate service of the Government of either of the Powers at war.

No armed vessel which has been or shall be originally fitted out in any port of the United States, by either of the parties at war, is henceforth to have an asylum in any district of the United States. If any such armed vessel shall appear within your district, she is immediately to be notified to the Governor, and attorney of the district, which is also to be done in respect to any prize that such armed vessel shall bring or send in. At foot is a list of such armed vessels of the above description as have hitherto come to the knowledge of the Executive.

The purchasing within, and exporting from the United States, by way of merchandise, articles commonly called contraband, being generally warlike instruments and military stores, is free to all the parties at war, and is not to be interfered with. If our own citizens undertake to carry them to any of those parties, they will be abandoned to the penalties which the laws of war authorize.

You will be particularly careful to observe, and to notify as directed in other instances, the case of any citizen of the United States who shall be found in the service of either of the parties at war.

In case any vessel shall be found in the act of contravening any of the rules or principles which are the ground of this instruction, she is to be refused a clearance until she shall have complied with what the Governor shall have decided in reference to her. Care, however, is to be taken in this, not unnecessarily or unreasonably to embarrass trade, or to vex any of the parties concerned.

In order that contraband articles may be the better ascertained, it is desired that the officer who shall first go on board any vessel arriving within your district, shall make an accurate survey of her then condition as to military equipment, to be forthwith reported to you; and that, prior to her clearance, a like survey be made that any transgression of the rules laid down may be ascertained.

But, as the propriety of any such inspection of a vessel of war in the immediate service of the Government of a foreign nation is not without question in reference to the usage of nations, no attempt is to be made to inspect any such vessel, till further order on the point.

The President desires me to signify to you his most particular expectation, that the instruction contained in this letter will be executed with the greatest vigilance, care, activity, and impartiality. Omissions will tend to expose the Government to injurious imputations and suspicions, and proportionably to commit the good faith and peace of the country—objects of too much importance not to engage every proper exertion of your zeal.

With consideration, I am, sir, &c.

ALEXANDER HAMILTON.

1. The original arming and equipping of vessels in the ports of the United States, by any of the belligerent parties, for military service, offensive or defensive, is deemed unlawful.
2. Equipments of merchant vessels, by either of the belligerent parties, in the ports of the United States, purely for the accommodation of them as such, is deemed lawful.
3. Equipments in the ports of the United States, of vessels of war in the immediate service of the Government of any of the belligerent parties, which, if done to other vessels, would be of a doubtful nature, as being applicable either to commerce or war, are deemed lawful; except those which shall have made prize of the subjects, people, or property of France, coming with their prizes into the ports of the United States, pursuant to the 17th article of our treaty of amity and commerce with France.
4. Equipments in the ports of the United States, by any of the parties at war with France, of vessels fitted for merchandise and war, whether with or without commissions, which are doubtful in their nature as being applicable either to commerce or war, are deemed lawful; except those which shall have made prize, &c.
5. Equipments of any of the vessels of France, in the ports of the United States, which are doubtful in their nature as being applicable to commerce or war, are deemed lawful.
6. Equipments of every kind, in the ports of the United States, of privateers of the Powers at war with France, are deemed unlawful.
7. Equipments of vessels in the ports of the United States, which are of a nature solely adapted to war, are deemed unlawful; except those stranded or wrecked, as mentioned in the 18th article of our treaty with France, the 16th of our treaty with the United Netherlands, the 9th of our treaty with Prussia; and, except those mentioned in the 19th article of our treaty with France, the 17th of our treaty with the United Netherlands, the 18th of our treaty with Prussia.
8. Vessels of either of the parties, not armed, or armed previous to their coming into the ports of the United States, which shall not have infringed any of the foregoing rules, may lawfully engage or enlist therein their own subjects or citizens, not being inhabitants of the United States; except privateers of the Powers at war with France, and except those vessels which shall have made prize, &c.

Report of the Secretary of State, on the Privileges and Restrictions on the Commerce of the United States in Foreign Countries.

PHILADELPHIA, Dec. 16, 1793.

Sir: According to the pleasure of the House of Representatives, expressed in their resolution of Commercial Privileges and Restrictions.

February 23, 1791, I now lay before them a Report on the Privileges and Restrictions on the Commerce of the United States in Foreign Countries. In order to keep the subject within those bounds, which I supposed to be under the contemplation of the House, I have restrained my statements to those countries only, with which we carry on a commerce of some importance, and to those articles also of our produce, which are of sensible weight in the scale of our exports; and even these articles are sometimes grouped together, according to the degree of favor or restriction with which they are received in each country, and that degree expressed in general terms, without detailing the exact duty levied on each article.

To have gone fully into these minutiae, would have been to copy the tariffs and books of rates of the different countries, and to have hidden under a mass of detail these general and important truths, the extraction of which in a simple form, I conceived, would best answer the inquiries of the House, by condensing material information within those limits of time and attention which this portion of their duties may justly claim. The plan, indeed, of minute details, would have been impracticable with some countries for want of information.

Since preparing this Report, which was put into its present form, in time to have been given in to the last session of Congress, alterations of the conditions of our commerce with some foreign nations have taken place, some of them independent of the war, some arising out of it. France has proposed to enter into a new treaty of commerce with us on liberal principles; and has, in the meantime, relaxed some of the restraints mentioned in the report. Spain has by an ordinance of June last, established New Orleans, Pensacola, and St. Augustine, into free ports, for the vessels of friendly nations having treaties of commerce with her, provided they touch for a permit at Corubion in Galicia, or at Alicant; and our rice is by the same ordinance excluded from that country. The circumstances of the war have necessarily given us freer access to the West India islands, whilst they have also drawn on our navigation vexations and depredations of the most serious nature.

To have endeavored to describe all these would have been as impracticable as useless, since the scenes would have been shifting while under description. I therefore think it best to leave the report as it was formed, being adapted to a particular point of time, when things were in their settled order, that is to say, to the Summer of 1792.

I have the honor to be, with the most profound respect, sir, your most obedient and most humble servant,

TH. JEFFERSON.

To the Hon. the SPEAKER of the House of Representatives of the United States of America.

The SECRETARY OF STATE, to whom was referred by the House of Representatives the Report of a Committee on the written Message of the President of the United States, of the 14th of February, 1791, with instruction to report to Congress the nature and extent of the Privileges and Restrictions of the Commercial Intercourse of the United States with Foreign Nations, and the measures which he should think proper to be adopted, for the improvement of the Commerce and Navigation of the same, has had the same under consideration, and thereupon makes the following Report:

The countries with which the United States have their chief commercial intercourse are, Spain, Portugal, France, Great Britain, the United Netherlands, Denmark, and Sweden, and their American possessions; and the articles of export which constitute the basis of that commerce, with their respective amounts, are—

Breadstuff, that is to say, bread-grains, meals, and bread, to the annual amount of	- $7,649,887
Tobacco	- 4,349,567
Rice	- 1,758,796
Wood	- 1,263,534
Salted fish	- 941,696
Pot and pearl ash	- 839,093
Salted meats	- 599,130
Indigo	- 537,379
Horses and mules	- 339,753
Whale oil	- 252,591
Flaxseed	- 236,072
Tar, pitch, and turpentine	- 217,177
Live provisions	- 137,743
Ships	- 620,274
Foreign goods	- 620,274

To descend to articles of smaller value than these, would lead into a minuteness of detail neither necessary nor useful to the present object.

The proportions of our exports, which go to the nations before mentioned, and to their dominions, respectively, are as follows:

To Spain and its dominions	- $2,005,907
To Portugal and its dominions	- 1,383,463
To France and its dominions	- 4,698,735
To Great Britain and its dominions	- 9,363,416
To the United Netherlands and their dominions	- 1,963,880
To Denmark and its dominions	- 224,415
To Sweden and its dominions	- 47,240
Our imports from the same countries are—
To Spain and its dominions	- $335,110
To Portugal and its dominions	- 595,768
To France and its dominions	- 2,068,848
To Great Britain and its dominions	- 15,285,428
To the United Netherlands and their dominions	- 1,172,693
To Denmark and its dominions	- 851,394
To Sweden and its dominions	- 14,825

These imports consist mostly of articles on which industry has been exhausted.

Our navigation depending on the same commerce will appear by the following statement of the tonnage of our own vessels entering in our ports, from those several nations, and their possessions, in one year, that is to say, from October, 1789, to September, 1790, inclusive, as follows:

	Tons.
Spain	19,695
Portugal	23,676
France	119,410
Great Britain	43,580
United Netherlands	58,858
Denmark	14,655
Sweden	750

Of our commercial objects, SPAIN receives favorably our bread-stuff, salted fish, wood, ships, tar, pitch, and turpentine. On our meals, however, as well as on those of other foreign countries, when re-exported to their colonies, they have lately imposed duties of from half a dollar to two dollars the barrel, the duties being so proportioned to the current price of their own flour, as that both together are to make the constant sum of nine dollars per barrel.

They do not discourage our rice, pot and pearl ash, salted provisions, or whale oil; but these articles being in small demand at their markets, are carried thither but in a small degree. Their demand for rice, however, is increasing. Neither tobacco nor indigo are received there. Our commerce is permitted with their Canary Islands under the same conditions.

Themselves and their colonies are the actual consumers of what they receive from us.

Our navigation is free with the kingdom of Spain—foreign goods being received there in our ships on the same conditions as if carried in their own, or in the vessels of the country of which such goods are the manufacture or produce.

PORTUGAL receives favorably our grain and bread, salted fish and other salted provisions.

For flaxseed, pot, and pearl ash, though not discouraged, there is little demand.

Our ships pay twenty per cent. on being sold to their subjects, and are then free bottoms.

Foreign goods (except those of the East Indies) are received on the same footing in our vessels as in their own, or any others; that is to say, on general duties of from twenty to twenty-eight per cent., and, consequently, our navigation is unobstructed by them. Tobacco, rice and meals, are prohibited.

Themselves and their colonies consume what they receive from us.

These regulations extend to the Azores, Madeira, and the Cape de Verd Islands, except that in these, meals and rice are received freely.

FRANCE receives favorably our breadstuffs, rice, wood, pot, and pearl ashes.

A duty of five sous the quintal, or nearly four and a half cents, is paid on our tar, pitch, and turpentine. Our whale oils pay six livres the quintal, and are the only foreign whale oils admitted. Our indigo pays five livres the quintal; their own two and a half; but a difference of quality, still more than a difference of duty, prevents its seeking that market.

Salted beef is received freely for re-exportation; but if for home consumption, it pays five livres the quintal. Other salted provisions pay that duty in all cases, and salted fish is made lately to pay the prohibitory one of twenty livres the quintal.

Our ships are free to carry thither all foreign goods, which may be carried in their own or any other vessels, except tobacco not of our own growth; and they participate with theirs the exclusive carriage of our whale oils and tobaccos.

During their former Government our tobacco was under a monopoly, but paid no duties; and our ships were freely sold in their ports and converted into national bottoms. The first National Assembly took from our ships this privilege. They emancipated tobacco from its monopoly, but subjected it to duties of eighteen livres and fifteen sous the quintal, carried in their own vessels, and twenty-five livres, carried in ours—a difference more than equal to the freight of the article.

They and their colonies consume what they receive from us.

GREAT BRITAIN receives our pot and pearl ashes free, while those of other nations pay a duty of two shillings and three pence the quintal. There is an equal distinction in favor of our bar iron—of which article, however, we do not produce enough for our own use. Woods are free from us, whilst they pay some small duty from other countries. Indigo and flaxseed are free from all countries. Our tar and pitch pay 11d. sterling the barrel. From other alien countries they pay about a penny and a third more.

Our tobacco, for their own consumption, pays 1s. 8d. sterling the pound, custom and excise, besides heavy expenses of collection. And rice, in the same case, pays 7s. 4d. sterling the hundred weight; which, rendering it too dear as an article of common food, it is consequently used in very small quantity.

Our salted fish, and other salted provisions, except bacon, are prohibited. Bacon and whale oils are under prohibitory duties; so are our grains, meals, and bread, as to internal consumption, unless in times of such scarcity as may raise the price of wheat to 50s. sterling the quarter, and other grains and meals in proportion.

Our ships, though purchased and navigated by their own subjects, are not permitted to be used even in their trade with us.

While the vessels of other nations are secured by standing laws, which cannot be altered but by the concurrent will of the three branches of the British Legislature, in carrying thither any produce or manufacture of the country to which they belong, which may be lawfully carried in any vessels, ours, with the same prohibition of what is foreign, are further prohibited by a standing law (12 Car. 2, 18, § 3) from carrying thither all and any of our domestic productions and manufactures. A subsequent act, indeed, has authorized their Executive to permit the carriage of our own productions in our own bottoms at its sole discretion; and the permission has been given from year to year by proclamation, but subject every movement to be withdrawn on that single will; in which event, our vessels having any thing on board, stand interdicted from the entry of all Commercial Privileges and Restrictions.

British ports. The disadvantage of a tenure which may be so suddenly discontinued, was experienced by our merchants on a late occasion, when an official notification that this law would be strictly enforced, gave them just apprehensions for the fate of their vessels and cargoes despatched or destined to the ports of Great Britain. The Minister of that Court, indeed, frankly expressed his personal conviction that the words of the Order went farther than was intended, and so he afterwards officially informed us; but the embarrassments of the moment were real and great, and the possibility of their renewal lays our commerce to that country under the same species of discouragement as to other countries where it is regulated by a single legislator; and the distinction is too remarkable not to be noticed, that our navigation is excluded from the security of fixed laws, while that security is given to the navigation of others.

Our vessels pay in their ports 1s. 9d. sterling per ton, light and Trinity dues, more than is paid by British ships, except in the port of London, where they pay the same as British.

The greater part of what they receive from us is re-exported to other countries, under the useless charges of an intermediate deposit, and double voyage. From tables published in England, and composed as is said from the books of their custom-houses, it appears that of the indigo imported there in the years 1773-74-75, one-third was re-exported; and from a document of authority, we learn that, of the rice and tobacco imported there, before the war, four-fifths were re-exported. We are assured, indeed, that the quantities sent thither for re-exportation since the war, are considerably diminished, yet less so than reason and national interest would dictate. The whole of our grain is re-exported when wheat is below 50s. the quarter, and other grains in proportion.

The UNITED NETHERLANDS prohibit our pickled beef and pork, meals and bread, of all sorts, and lay a prohibitory duty on spirits distilled from grain.

All other of our productions are received on varied duties, which may be reckoned on a medium at about three per cent.

They consume but a small proportion of what they receive. The residue is partly forwarded for consumption in the inland parts of Europe, and partly reshipped to other maritime countries. On the latter portion they intercept between us and the consumer so much of the value as is absorbed by the charges attending an intermediate deposit.

Foreign goods, except some East India articles, are received in vessels of any nation.

Our ships may be sold and naturalized there, with exceptions of one or two privileges, which somewhat lessen their value.

DENMARK lays considerable duties on our tobacco and rice carried in their own vessels, and half as much more if carried in ours; but the exact amount of these duties is not perfectly known here. They lay such as amount to prohibitions on our indigo and corn.

SWEDEN receives favorably our grains and meals, salted provisions, indigo and whale oil.

They subject our rice to duties of sixteen mills the pound weight, carried in their own vessels, and of forty per cent. additional on that, or 23 4-10 mills, carried in ours, or any others. Being thus rendered too dear as an article of common food, little of it is consumed with them. They consume some of our tobaccos, which they take circuitously through Great Britain, levying heavy duties on them also; their duties of entry, town duties, and excise, being $4 34 the hundred weight, if carried in their own vessels, and of forty per cent. on that additional, if carried in our own or any other vessels.

They prohibit altogether our bread, fish, pot and pearl ashes, flaxseed, tar, pitch, and turpentine, wood, (except oak timber and masts,) and all foreign manufactures.

Under so many restrictions and prohibitions, our navigation with them is reduced almost to nothing.

With our neighbors, an order of things much harder presents itself:

SPAIN and PORTUGAL refuse to those parts of America which they govern all direct intercourse with any people but themselves. The commodities in mutual demand, between them and their neighbors, must be carried to be exchanged in some port of the dominant country; and the transportation between that and the subject State must be in a domestic bottom.

FRANCE, by a standing law, permits her West India possessions to receive directly our vegetables, live provisions, horses, wood, tar, pitch, and turpentine, rice, and maize, and prohibits our other breadstuffs; but a suspension of this prohibition having been left to the Colonial Legislatures, in times of scarcity, it was formerly suspended occasionally, but latterly without interruption.

Our fish and salted provisions (except pork) are received in their islands under a duty of three Colonial livres the quintal, and our vessels are as free as their own to carry our commodities thither, and to bring away rum and molasses.

GREAT BRITAIN admits in her islands our vegetables, live provisions, horses, wood, tar, pitch, and turpentine, rice, and breadstuffs, by a proclamation of her Executive, limited always to the term of a year, but hitherto renewed from year to year. She prohibits our salted fish, and other salted provisions. She does not permit our vessels to carry thither our own produce. Her vessels alone may take it from us, and bring us in exchange rum, molasses, sugar, coffee, cocoa nuts, ginger, and pimento. There are, indeed, some freedoms in the island of Dominica, but, under such circumstances, as to be little used by us. In the British Continental Colonies, and in Newfoundland, all our productions are prohibited, and our vessels forbidden to enter their ports. Their Governors, however, in times of distress, have power to permit a temporary importation of certain articles in their own bottoms, but not in ours.

Our citizens cannot reside as merchants or factors within any of the British plantations, this being expressly prohibited by the same statute of 12 Car. 2, c. 18, commonly called the Navigation Act.

In the DANISH AMERICAN possessions a duty of five per cent is levied on our corn, cornmeal, rice, tobacco, wood, salted fish, indigo, borses, mules, and live stock; and of ten per cent on our flour, salted pork, and beef, tar, pitch, and turpentine.

In the American islands of the UNITED NETHERLANDS and SWEDEN our vessels and produce are received, subject to duties, not so heavy as to have been complained of; but they are heavier in the Dutch possessions on the Continent.

To sum up these Restrictions so far as they are important:

1. In EUROPE.—Our breadstuff is at most times under prohibitory duties in England, and considerably dutied on re-exportation from Spain to her colonies.

Our tobaccos are heavily dutied in England, Sweden and France, and prohibited in Spain and Portugal.

Our rice is heavily dutied in England and Sweden, and prohibited in Portugal.

Our fish and salted provisions are prohibited in England, and under prohibitory duties in France.

Our whale oils are prohibited in England and Portugal.

And our vessels are denied naturalization in England, and of late in France.

2. In THE WEST INDIES.—All intercourse is prohibited with the possessions of Spain and Portugal.

Our salted provisions and fish are prohibited by England.

Our salted pork and breadstuff (except maize) are received under temporary laws only in the dominions of France, and our salted fish pays there a weighty duty.

3. In THE ARTICLES OF NAVIGATION.—Our own carriage of our own tobacco is heavily dutied in Sweden, and lately in France.

We carry no article not of our own production to the British ports in Europe.

Nor even our own produce to her American possessions.

Such being the restrictions on the commerce and navigation of the United States, the question is, in what way they may best be removed, modified, or counteracted?

As to commerce two methods occur: 1. By friendly arrangements with the several nations with whom these restrictions exist; or, 2. By the separate act of our own Legislature for countervailing their effects.

There can be no doubt but that of these two friendly arrangement is the most eligible. Instead of embarrassing commerce under piles of regulating laws, duties, and prohibitions, could it be relieved from all its shackles in all parts of the world—could every country be employed in producing that which nature has best fitted it to produce, and each be free to exchange with others mutual surpluses for mutual wants, the greatest mass possible would then be produced of those things which contribute to human life and human happiness—the numbers of mankind would be increased, and their condition bettered.

Would even a single nation begin with the United States this system of free commerce, it would be advisable to begin it with that nation, since it is one by one only that it can be extended to all. Where the circumstances of either party render it expedient to levy a revenue, by way of impost, on commerce, its freedom might be modified, in that particular, by mutual and equivalent measures, preserving it entire in all others.

Some nations, not yet ripe for free commerce, in all its extent, might still be willing to mollify its restrictions and regulations for us in proportion to the advantages which an intercourse with us might offer. Particularly they may concur with us in reciprocating the duties to be levied on each side, or in compensating any excess of duty by equivalent advantages of another nature. Our commerce is certainly of a character to entitle it to favor in most countries. The commodities we offer are either necessities of life, or materials for manufacture, or convenient subjects for revenue; and we take in exchange either manufactures, when they have received the last finish of art and industry, or mere luxuries. Such customers may reasonably expect welcome and friendly treatment at every market—customers, too, whose demands, increasing with their wealth and population, must very shortly give full employment to the whole industry of any nation whatever, in any line of supply they may get into the habit of calling for from it.

But should any nation, contrary to our wishes, suppose it may better find its advantage by continuing its system of prohibitions, duties, and regulations, it behoves us to protect our citizens, their commerce, and navigation, by counter prohibitions, duties, and regulations also. Free commerce and navigation are not to be given in exchange for restrictions and vexations; nor are they likely to produce a relaxation of them.

Our navigation involves still higher considerations. As a branch of industry it is valuable; but, as a resource of defence, essential.

Its value, as a branch of industry, is enhanced by the dependence of so many other branches on it. In times of general peace it multiplies competitors for employment in transportation, and so keeps that at its proper level; and in times of war, that is to say, when those nations who may be our principal carriers, shall be at war with each other, if we have not within ourselves the means of transportation, our produce must be exported in belligerent vessels at the increased expense of war-freight and insurance, and the articles which will not bear that must perish on our hands.

But it is as a resource for defence that our navigation will admit neither neglect nor forbearance. The position and circumstances of the United States leave them nothing to fear on their land, board, and nothing to desire beyond their present rights. But, on their seaboard, they are open to injury, and they have there, too, a commerce which must be protected. This can only be done by possessing a respectable body of citizen seamen, and of artists and establishments in readiness for ship-building.

Were the ocean, which is the common property of all, open to the industry of all, so that every person and vessel should be free to take employment wherever it could be found, the United States would certainly not set the example of appropriating to themselves exclusively any portion of the common stock of occupation. They would rely on the enterprise and activity of their citizens for a due participation of the benefits of the seafaring business, and for keeping the marine class of citizens equal to their object. But if particular nations grasp at undue shares, and more especially, if they seize on the means of the United States to convert them into aliment for their own strength, and withdraw them entirely from the support of those to whom they belong, defensive and protecting measures become necessary on the part of the nation whose marine resources are thus invaded, or it will be disarmed of its defence; its productions will lie at the mercy of the nation which has possessed itself exclusively of the means of carrying them, and its politics may be influenced by those who command its commerce. The carriage of our own commodities, if once established in another channel, cannot be resumed in the moment we may desire. If we lose the seamen and artists, whom it now occupies, we lose the present means of marine defence, and time will be requisite to raise up others, when disgrace or losses shall bring home to our feelings the error of having abandoned them. The materials for maintaining our due share of navigation are ours in abundance; and, as to the mode of using them, we have only to adopt the principles of those who thus put us on the defensive, or others equivalent and better fitted to our circumstances.

The following principles, being founded in reciprocity, appear perfectly just, and to offer no cause of complaint to any nation:

1. Where a nation imposes high duties on our productions, or prohibits them altogether, it may be proper for us to do the same by theirs, first burdening or excluding those productions which they bring here in competition with our own of the same kind—selecting next such manufactures as we take from them in greatest quantity, and which at the same time we could the soonest furnish to ourselves, or obtain from other countries—imposing on them duties lighter at first, but heavier and heavier afterwards, as other channels of supply open. Such duties having the effect of indirect encouragement to domestic manufactures of the same kind may induce the manufacturer to come himself into these States where cheaper subsistence, equal laws, and a vent of his wares, free of duty, may insure him the highest profits from his skill and industry. And here it would be in the power of the State Governments to co-operate essentially by opening the resources of encouragement which are under their control, extending them liberally to artists in those particular branches of manufacture, for which their soil, climate, population, and other circumstances, have matured them, and fostering the precious efforts and progress of household manufacture by some patronage suited to the nature of its objects, guided by the local informations which they possess, and guarded against abuse by their presence and attentions. The oppressions on our agriculture in foreign ports would thus be made the occasion of relieving it from a dependence on the councils and conduct of others, and of promoting arts, manufactures, and population at home.

2. Where a nation refuses permission to our merchants and factors to reside within certain parts of their dominions, we may, if it should be thought expedient, refuse residence to theirs in any and every part of ours, or modify their transactions.

3. Where a nation refuses to receive in our vessels any productions but our own, we may refuse to receive, in theirs, any but their own productions. The first and second clauses of the bill reported by the Committee are well formed to effect this object.

4. Where a nation refuses to consider any vessel as ours, which has not been built within our Territories, we should refuse to consider as theirs any vessel not built within their Territories.

5. Where a nation refuses to our vessels the carriage even of our own productions to certain countries under their domination, we might refuse to the same productions to the same countries. But, as justice and good neighborhood would dictate, that those who have no part in imposing the restriction on us, should not be the victims of measures adopted to defeat its effect, it may be proper to confine the restriction to vessels owned or navigated by any subjects of the same dominant Power, other than the inhabitants of the country to which the said productions are to be carried. And to prevent all inconvenience to the said inhabitants, and to our own, by too sudden a check on the means of transportation, we may continue to admit the vessels marked for future exclusion, on an advanced tonnage, and for such length of time only as may be supposed necessary to provide against that inconvenience.

The establishment of some of these principles by Great Britain alone has already lost us in our commerce with that country and its possessions between eight and nine hundred vessels of near 40,000 tons burden, according to statements from official materials in which they have confidence. This involves a proportional loss of seamen, shipwrights, and ship-building, and is too serious a loss to admit forbearance of some effectual remedy.

It is true we must expect some inconvenience in practice from the establishment of discriminating duties. But in this, as in so many other cases, we are left to choose between two evils. These inconveniences are nothing when weighed against the loss of wealth, and loss of force, which will follow our perseverance in the plan of indiscriminate. When once it shall be perceived that we are either in the system or in the habit of giving equal advantages to those who distinguish our commerce and navigation, by duties and prohibitions, as to those who treat both with liberality and justice, liberality and justice will be converted by all into duties and prohibitions. It is not to the moderation and justice of others we are to trust for fair and equal access to market with our productions, or for our due share in the transportation of them, but to our own means of independence, and the firm will to use them. Nor do the inconveniences of discrimination merit consideration. Not one of the nations before-mentioned—perhaps not a commercial nation on earth—is without them. In our case one distinction alone will suffice, that is to say, between nations who favor our productions and navigation, and those who do not favor them. One set of moderate duties, say the present duties, for the first, and a fixed advance on these, as to some articles, and prohibitions as to others, for the last.

Still it must be repeated that friendly arrangements are preferable with all who will come into them; and that we should carry into such arrangements all the liberality and spirit of accommodation which the nature of the case will admit.

France has, of her own accord, proposed negotiations for improving, by a new treaty, on fair and equal principles, the commercial relations of the two countries. But her internal disturbances have hitherto prevented the prosecution of them to effect, though we have had repeated assurances of a continuance of the disposition.

Proposals of friendly arrangement have been made on our part, by the present Government, to that of Great Britain, as the Message states; but, being already on as good a footing in law, and a better in fact than the most favored nations, they have not, as yet, discovered any disposition to have it meddled with.

We have no reason to conclude that friendly arrangements would be declined by the other nations with whom we have such commercial intercourse as may render them important. In the meanwhile, it would rest with the wisdom of Congress to determine whether, as to those nations, they will not surcease ex parte regulations, on the reasonable presumption that they will concur in doing whatever justice and moderation dictate should be done.

DECREE RELATING TO COMMERCE.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE, to whom the President of the United States referred the resolution of the House of Representatives of December 24, 1793, desiring the substance of all such laws, decrees, or ordinances, respecting commerce in any of the countries with which the United States have commercial intercourse, as have been received by the Secretary of State, and not already stated to the House in his report of the 16th instant, reports:

That he has had an official communication of a Decree rendered by the National Assembly of France on the 26th day of March last, of which the following is a translation:

DECREE,

Exempting from all duties the substances and other objects of supply in the Colonies, relating to the United States, pronounced in the sitting of the 26th of March, 1793, 2d year of the French Republic.

The National Convention, willing to prevent, by precise dispositions, the difficulties that might arise relatively to the execution of its decree of the 19th February last, concerning the United States of America—to grant favors to this ally-nation, and to treat it, in its commercial relations with the Colonies of France, in the same manner as the vessels of the Republic—decree as follows:

ART. 1. From the day of the publication of the present decree in the French American Colonies, the vessels of the United States, of the burden of sixty tons at the least, laden only with meals and subsistences, as well as the objects of supply announced in article 2, of the arrêt of 30th August, 1784, as also lard, butter, salted salmon, and candles, shall be admitted in the ports of said Colonies exempt from all duties. The same exemption shall extend to the French vessels laden with the same articles, and coming from a foreign port.

ART. 2. The captains of vessels of the United States, who, having brought into the French American Colonies the objects comprised in the above article, wish to return to the territory of the said States, may lade in the said Colonies, independent of sirups, rum, taffias, and French merchandises, a quantity of coffee equivalent to the one-fifth of the tonnage of every vessel, as also a quantity of sugar equal to the one-tenth, on conforming to the following articles:

ART. 3. Every captain of an American vessel, who wishes to make returns to the United States of coffee and sugar of the French Colonies, shall make it appear that his vessel entered therein with at least two-thirds of her cargo, according to article 1. For this purpose, he shall be obliged to transmit, within twenty-four hours after his arrival, to the custom-house of the place he may land at, a certificate of the marine agents, establishing the gauge of his vessel and the effective tonnage of her cargo. The heads of the said custom-houses shall assure themselves that the exportation of the sugars and coffee does not exceed the proportion fixed by the second article of the present decree.

ART. 4. The captains of vessels of the United States of America shall not pay, on going from the islands, as well as those of the Republic, but a duty of 5 livres per quintal of indigo, 10 livres per thousand weight of cotton, 5 livres per thousand weight of coffee, 5 livres per thousand weight of brown and clayed sugars, and 50 sols per thousand weight of raw sugar. Every other merchandise shall be exempt from duty on going out of the Colonies.

ART. 5. The sugars and coffee which shall be laden shall pay at the custom-houses which are established in the colonies, or that shall be established, in addition to the duties above fixed, those imposed by the law of 19th March, 1791, on the sugars and coffee imported from the said Colonies to France, and conformably to the same law.

ART. 6. The captains of vessels of the United States, who wish to lade merchandises of the said Colonies, for the ports of France, shall furnish the custom-house at the place of departure with the bonds required of the masters of French vessels, by the second article of the law of 10th July, 1791, to secure the unloading of these merchandises in the ports of the Republic.

ART. 7. The vessels of the nations with whom the French Republic is not at war may carry to the French American Colonies all the objects designated by the present decree. They may also bring, into the ports of the Republic only, all the productions of the said Colonies, on the conditions announced in the said decree, as well as that of 19th of February.

GENET.

That he has not received officially any copy of the decree said to have been rendered by the same Assembly on the 27th day of July last, subjecting the vessels of the United States laden with provisions to be carried, against their will, into the ports of France, and those having enemy goods on board to have such goods taken out as legal prize.

That an ordinance has been passed by the Government of Spain, on the 9th day of June last, the substance of which has been officially communicated to him in the following words, to wit:

Extract of an Ordinance for regulating provisionally the commerce of Louisiana and the Floridas, dated the 9th of June, 1793.

The preamble states that the inhabitants of Louisiana, being deprived of their commerce with France, (on account of the war,) as allowed by the ordinance of January, 1782, &c., His Majesty considering that they and the inhabitants of the Floridas cannot subsist without the means of disposing of their productions and of acquiring those necessary for their own consumption; for that purpose, and to increase the national commerce—the commerce of those provinces and their agriculture—has directed the following articles to be provisionally observed:

The inhabitants of the above-mentioned provinces to be allowed to commerce freely both in Europe and America with all friendly nations who have treaties of commerce with Spain; New Orleans, Pensacola, and St. Augustine, to be ports for that purpose. No exception as to the articles to be sent or to be received. Every vessel, however, to be subjected to touch at Coreubion, in Galicia, or Alicant, and to take a permit there, without which, the entry not to be allowed in the ports above mentioned.

The articles of this commerce, carried on thus directly between those provinces and foreign nations to pay a duty of fifteen per cent. importations and six per cent. exportation, except negroes, who may be imported free of duty. The productions and silver exported to purchase those negroes to pay the six per cent. exportation duty. The exportation of silver to be allowed for this purpose only.

The commerce between Spain and those provinces to remain free. Spaniards to be allowed to observe the same rules and to fit out from the same ports (in vessels wholly belonging to them, without connexion with foreigners) for those provinces as for the other Spanish Colonies.

To remove all obstacles to this commerce, all sorts of merchandise destined for Louisiana and the Floridas (even those whose admission is prohibited for other places) may be entered in the ports of Spain, and, in like manner, tobacco and all other prohibited articles may be imported into Spain from these provinces, to be re-exported to foreign countries.

To improve this commerce and encourage the agriculture of those provinces, the importation of foreign rice into the ports of Spain is prohibited, and a like preference shall be given to the other productions of these provinces, when they shall suffice for the consumption of Spain.

All articles exported from Spain to these provinces shall be free of duty on exportation, and such as being foreign, shall have paid duty on importation into Spain, shall have it restored to exporters.

These foreign articles, thus exported, to pay a duty of three per cent. on entry in those provinces. Those which are not foreign to be free of duty.

The articles exported from those provinces to Spain or re-exported to foreign countries.

Those Spanish vessels which, having gone from Spain to those provinces, should desire to bring back productions from thence directly to the foreign ports of Europe, may do it on paying a duty of exportation of three per cent.

All vessels, both Spanish and foreign, sailing to those provinces, to be prohibited from touching at any other port in His Majesty's American Dominions.

No vessel to be fitted out from New Orleans, Pensacola, or St. Augustine, for any of the Spanish islands or other Dominions in America, except for some urgent cause, in which case only the respective Governors to give a permission, but without allowing any other articles to be embarked than the productions of those provinces.

All foreign vessels purchased by His Majesty's subjects, and destined for this commerce, to be exempted from those duties to which they are at present subjected, they proving that they are absolute and sole proprietors thereof.

He takes this occasion to note an act of the British Parliament, of the 28 George III., chap. 6, which, though passed before the epoch to which his report aforesaid related, had escaped his researches. The effect of it was to convert the proclamations regulating our direct intercourse with their West Indian islands into a standing law, and so far to remove the unfavorable distinction between us and foreign nations, stated in the report, leaving it, however, in full force as to our circuitous intercourse with the same islands, and as to our general intercourse, direct and circuitous, with Great Britain and all her other Dominions.

TH. JEFFERSON.

DECEMBER 30, 1793.

SPOILIATIONS ON COMMERCE.

Genilemen of the Senate, and of the House of Representatives:

The Secretary of State having reported to me upon the several complaints which have been lodged in this office against the vexations and spoliations on our commerce since the commencement of the European war, I transmit to you a copy of his statement, together with the documents upon which it is founded.

GEORGE WASHINGTON.

UNITED STATES, March 5, 1794.

PHILADELPHIA, March 2, 1794.

SIR: In your Message to both Houses of Congress, on the 5th of December, 1793, you inform them, that "The vexations and spoliations understood to have been committed on our vessels and commerce by the cruisers and officers of some of the belligerent Powers, appeared to require attention: That the proofs of these, however, not having been brought forward, the description of citizens, supposed to have suffered, were notified, that on furnishing them to the Executive, due measures would be taken to obtain redress of the past, and more effectual provisions against the future," and that "should such documents be furnished, proper representations will be made thereon, with a just reliance on a redress proportioned to the exigency of the case."

On my succession to the Department of State, I found a large volume of complaints—which the notification had collected—against severities on our trade, various in their kind and degree. Having reason to presume, as the fact has proved, that every day would increase the catalogue, I have waited to digest the mass, until time should have been allowed for exhibiting the diversified forms in which our commerce has hourly suffered. Every information is at length obtained which may be expected.

The sensations excited by the embarrassments, danger, and even ruin, which threaten our trade, cannot be better expressed than in the words of the committee of Philadelphia. After enumerating particular instances of injury, their representation to Government proceeds thus: "On these cases, which are accompanied by the legal proofs, the committee think it unnecessary to enlarge, as the inferences will, of course, occur to the Secretary; but they beg leave to be permitted

"The committee conclude this representation with an assurance, that they have in no degree exaggerated in the statement they have made, and that they will continue to communicate all such information as they may further receive; of which nature, before the closing of this report, they are sorry to add, is that of the irruptions of the Algerines from the Mediterranean, in consequence of a truce concluded with that Regency, it is said, by the British Minister, on behalf of Portugal and Holland. This alarming event, to which some American ships, we hear, have already become victims, is of so distressing a nature, as must soon deprive us of some of the most lucrative branches of our commerce, if not speedily checked or prevented. The immediate rise it has produced in insurance, and the fears it may instil into our seamen and commanders, are of a nature highly deserving the serious consideration of Government, on whose protection and zeal for the interests, commercial and agricultural, of the country, the committee implicitly rely."

In a supplementary letter, the committee of Philadelphia make this conclusion: "That the cases which they recite, and others less formally announced, serve to show, that there are frequent instances of suppression of papers, registers, &c., very prejudicial to our shipping on their trials, and of injuries by the destruction of letters to the general correspondence of the country with foreign nations."

When we examine the documents which have been transmitted from different parts of the Union, we find the British, the French, the Spaniards, and the Dutch, charged with attacks upon our commerce.

It is urged against the British,

1. That their privateers plunder the American vessels, throw them out of their course, by forcing them, upon groundless suspicion, into ports other than those to which they were destined; detain them, even after the hope of a regular confiscation is abandoned; by their negligence, while they hold the possession, expose the cargoes to damage and the vessels to destruction, and maltreat their crews.

2. That British ships-of-war have forcibly seized mariners belonging to American vessels and in one instance, under the protection of a Portuguese fort.

3. That by British regulations and practice our corn and provisions are driven from the ports of France, and restricted to the ports of the British, or those of their friends.

4. That our vessels are not permitted to go from the British ports in the Islands, without giving security (which is not attainable but with difficulty and expense) for the discharge of the cargo, in some other British or neutral port.

5. That without the imputation of a contraband trade as defined by the Law of Nations, our vessels are captured for carrying on a commercial intercourse with the French West Indies, although it is tolerated by the laws of the French Republic, and that for this extraordinary conduct, no other excuse is alleged than that by some edict of a King of France, this intercourse was prohibited; and

6. That the conduct of the Admiralty in the British Islands is impeachable for an excess of rigor, and a departure from strict Judicial purity; and the expenses of an appeal to England too heavy to be encountered under all the circumstances of discouragement.

Against the French it is urged,

1. That their privateers harass our trade no less than those of the British.

2. That two of their ships-of-war have committed enormities on our vessels.

3. That their Courts of Admiralty are guilty of equal oppression.

4. That besides these points of accusation, which are common to the French and British, the former have infringed the treaty between the United States and them, by subjecting to seizure and condemnation our vessels trading with their enemies in merchandise, which that treaty declares not to be contraband, and under circumstances not forbidden by the Law of Nations.

5. That a very detrimental embargo has been laid upon large numbers of American vessels in the French ports; and

6. That a contract with the French Government for coin has been discharged in depreciated assignats.

Against the Spaniards the outrages of privateers are urged;

And against the Dutch, one condemnation in the Admiralty is insisted to be unwarrantable.

Under this complication of mischief, which persecutes our commerce, I beg leave, sir, to submit to your consideration, whether representations as far as facts may justify, ought not to be immediately pressed upon the foreign Governments, in those of the preceding cases, for which they are responsible.

Among these, I class, 1. The violence perpetrated by public ships-of-war. 2. Prohibitions, or regulations inconsistent with the Laws of Nations. 3. The improper conduct of Courts. 4. Infractions of Treaty. 5. The imposition of embargoes; and, 6. The breach of public contracts. How far a Government is liable to redress the rapine of privateers, depends upon the peculiarities of the case. It is incumbent upon it, however, to keep its Courts freely open, and to secure an impartial hearing to the injured applicant. If the rules prescribed to privateers be too loose, and opportunities of plunder or ill treatment be provoked from that cause, or from the prospect of impunity, it is impossible to be too strenuous in remonstrating against this formidable evil.

Thus, sir, have I reduced to general heads the particular complaints, without making any inquiry into the facts beyond the allegations of the parties interested.

I will only add, that your Message seems to promise to Congress some statement upon these subjects.

• There is reason to believe that the embargo was removed in December last, and the objection compensated by an order of the Committee of Public Safety in France.

Increase of Duties.

I have the honor, sir, to be, with the highest respect, your most obedient servant,
EDMUND RANDOLPH.
THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

INCREASE OF DUTIES.

[Communicated to the House of Representatives, April 17, 1794.]

Mr. WILLIAM SMITH, from the committee appointed to inquire whether any or what further revenues are necessary for the support of the public credit, and if further revenues are necessary, to report the ways and means, made the following Report:

That, on referring to the estimate laid before the Legislature by the Secretary of the Treasury, they find that the revenues to the end of the year 1794, are estimated to produce

And that, for the support of Government, Military Establishment, and other services designated by law, previous to, and during the present session, there would be wanting the sum of

And that further sums will probably be requisite for which provision ought to be made, viz: for the addition to the Military Establishment, provisional force, and expenses of militia

That the estimated product of the impost being made at a time when our commerce was unembarrassed, and no interruption of it contemplated, the committee are of opinion that a deduction should be made on that account, of $1,400,000; from which it results, that there is a deficiency of funds to answer the demands of the present year, of $2,375,79; but, as the sum of one million provided for foreign intercourse, is directed to be borrowed, if wanting, the committee have deducted that sum, except $160,000 for the interest arising thereon, which leaves the sum to be provided

To raise which sum, the committee propose that there be raised, by additional impost and tonnage

On carriages, wagons, carts, and drays
On stamps
On sales at auction
On manufactured tobacco and snuff
On loaf and lump sugars

On licenses for retailing wines and distilled spirits
By direct taxes on lands

Which sums exceed the current demands, $306,866 21; but as the estimates on most of the articles are conjectural, and without sufficient data for obtaining a correct opinion as to the probable amount, the committee have thought it more expedient to provide for a surplus than suffer the revenue to prove deficient; and, in conformity with the foregoing estimates, they submit the following resolutions:

Resolved, That, from and after the — day of — next, there be levied, collected, and paid, upon the following articles, imported into the United States in ships or vessels of the United States, with an addition of one-tenth per cent. on like articles imported in any other ships or vessels, the several duties hereinafter mentioned, over and above duties now paid, to be levied, collected, and paid in the same manner, by the same officers, subject to the same penalties, and entitled to drawbacks, as the same articles are now subject and entitled to, viz:

On boots, per pair, twenty-five cents.
On shoes and slippers, for men and women, and on clogs, and golo shoes, per pair, five cents.
On shoes and slippers for children, per pair, three cents.

On millinery, ready made, artificial flowers, feathers, and other ornaments for women's head-dresses, and on dolls, dressed and undressed, 5 per cent. ad valorem.

On cast, slit, and rolled iron, and generally on all manufactures of iron, steel, tin, pewter, copper, brass, or of which either of those metals is the article of chief value, not being otherwise particularly enumerated, (brass and iron wire, locks, hinges, hoes, anvils, and vices, excepted,) 5 per cent. ad valorem.

On carpets and carpeting, 5 per cent. ad valorem.
On leather, tanned or tawed, and generally all manufactures of leather, or of which leather is the article of chief value, not otherwise particularly enumerated, 5 per cent. ad valorem.

On medicinal drugs, except those commonly used in dyeing; on mats and floor cloths; on hats, caps, and bonnets, of every sort, for women; on gloves, mittens, stockings, fans, buttons, of every kind, buckles, (shoe and knee,) 5 per cent. ad valorem.

On sheathing and cartridge paper; on all powders, pastes, balls, balsams, quintments, oils, waters, washes, tinctures, essences, or other preparations, or compositions, commonly called sweet scents or odors, perfumes, or cosmetics; and on all dentifrices, powders, or preparations for the teeth or gums, 5 per cent. ad valorem.

On gold, silver, or plated ware, gold and silver lace, jewelry, and paste work, clocks and watches, and the parts of either, 5 per cent. ad valorem.

Increase of Duties.

On groceries, to wit: cinnamon, cloves, mace, nutmeg, ginger, aniseed, currants, dates, prunes, raisins, sugar-candy, oranges, lemons, limes, and generally all fruits and comfits, olives, capers, pickles of every sort, oil, and mustard in flour, 5 per cent. ad valorem.

On all marble, slate, or other stone, on bricks, tiles, tables, mortars, and other stone, and generally all stone and earthen ware, 5 per cent. ad valorem.

On cabinet wares, and all manufactures of wood, or of which wood is the material of chief value, 5 per cent. ad valorem.

On carriages, and parts of carriages, 4½ per cent.

On all manufactures of cotton or linen, or of muslin of cotton and linen, or of which cotton or linen is the material of chief value, being printed, stained, or colored, 2½ per cent.

On coffee, per pound, 1 cent.

On cocoa, per pound, 2 cents.

On cheese, per pound, 3 cents.

On salt, per bushel, 3 cents.

On the tonnage of ships or vessels of the United States employed in foreign trade, six cents per ton.

On all other ships or vessels, 25 cents per ton.
Resolved, That, after the — day of —, every person keeping a carriage, for the conveying of persons, for their own use, shall notify the same at some office which may be designated for the purpose, and shall pay, annually,
For a coach, 10 dollars.
For a chariot, 8 dollars.

For any other four-wheeled carriage, 6 dollars.
For a chaise, or other two wheeled carriage, 2 dollars.
With an addition of one-fourth, where two carriages shall be kept by one person; of one-third, where three carriages shall be kept by one person; and of one half, where more than three carriages are kept by the same person.

Resolved, That after the — day of —, there be paid the following stamp duties:
Letters patent, 2 dollars.
Exemplification thereof, 1 dollar.

Licenses or certificates of admission of solicitors, attorneys, clerks, advocates, proctors, and other officers of Courts, 6 dollars.
Exemplification under the seals of Courts, 50 cents.

Affidavits and affirmations, except those before the officers of the public revenue, those relative to suits pending in Courts, to be used therein, and those relative to criminal proceedings, 10 cents.
Deeds, except those otherwise particularly rated, 25 cents.
Charter parties, 1 dollar.
Bottomry and respondentia bonds, 1 dollar.
Apprentices' indentures, 15 cents.
Certificates of debentures for drawbacks, 20 cents.
Bills of lading coastwise, except for vessels going from one district to another within the same State, 10 cents.
Do. foreign, 20 cents.

Inventories of the effects of deceased persons, or for any other purpose prescribed by law, except in cases of goods distrained, or in compliance of any agreement between two or more persons, 10 cents.
Bonds for the security of money, when the sum is above fifty, and not exceeding one hundred dollars, 20 cents.

Above one hundred, and not exceeding five hundred dollars, 25 cents.

Above five hundred, and not exceeding one thousand dollars, 30 cents.

Receipts for legacies, or shares of personal estate, in cases of intestates, where the sum is above fifty, and not exceeding one hundred dollars, 25 cents.

More than one hundred, and not exceeding five hundred dollars, 50 cents.

For every further sum above five hundred dollars, 1 dollar.

[Not to extend to wives, children, or grand-children.]

Notarial acts, 25 cents.

Letters of attorney, 25 cents.

Policies of insurance, from one district to another in the United States, 20 cents.

To and from the United States to any foreign country, for any sum not exceeding five hundred dollars, 25 cents.

For every further sum more than five hundred dollars, 25 cents.

For every sum of two thousand dollars, or upwards, 1 dollar.

Probates of wills, and letters of administration, 50 cents.

Resolved, That, after the — day of —, there shall be paid on all sales at auction, except in cases of property sold upon execution, or by virtue of distresses for rent or tax, or in consequence of bankruptcies, and legal insolvencies, or where there have been general assignments for the benefit of creditors, or in cases where ships and goods have been stranded or wrecked, or in cases of sale by executors or administrators, or of produce sold upon the land where it is produced, at the rate of 1 per cent.

Resolved, That, after the — day of —, there shall be paid upon all tobacco manufactured in the United States, 4 cents per pound.

On all snuff, 8 cents per pound.

That every manufacturer of tobacco or snuff, shall, on or before the — day of —, make entry with the officer of inspection of the district in which he resides, of the house or building in which the manufactory is carried on, and shall enter into bond, with sufficient surety, to render a faithful account every three months, of the quantity of tobacco or snuff sold or sent out, within that period.

That, previous to taking in any tobacco for the purpose of being manufactured, he shall notify the same to the office of inspection, and shall keep a book in which shall be entered daily the quantity of tobacco or snuff sold or sent out in each day.

Resolved, That there be laid an additional duty of four cents per pound upon all tobacco, eight cents per pound on all snuff, and two cents per pound on all refined sugar imported into the United States, after the — day of —, there be paid on all sugars refined within the United States, 2 cents per pound.

Resolved. That after the — day of —, every person selling distilled spirits, or wines, for consumption out of their own dwellings, distilled spirits in less quantity than twenty gallons, wines in less quantity than thirty gallons, except in the original cask or package in which they were imported, shall take out licenses to authorize the sale of such distilled spirits and wines, and shall pay, annually, for a license to sell all foreign distilled spirits, $5 dollars.

For a license to sell all wines, $5 dollars.

Resolved. That the sum of seven hundred and fifty thousand dollars be raised by direct tax, for the year 1794, to be apportioned among the States, agreeably to the rule prescribed by the Constitution.

PUBLIC DEBT.

[Communicated to the House of Representatives, December 15, 1794.]

Mr. WILLIAM SMITH, from the Committee appointed to prepare and report a plan for the redemption of the Public Debt, made the following report:

That, from the documents accompanying this report, marked A and B, it appears that the surplus of the existing revenues beyond the probable expenditures for the year 1795 and to the succeeding years, will enable the Legislature to commence, during the year 1795, and to continue thereafter, the payment of that portion of the Public Debt which the Government has by law reserved the right to redeem.

The committee, therefore, submit the following resolution:

Resolved. That there be appropriated, out of the revenues of the year 1795, a sum not exceeding six hundred thousand dollars, to be applied to the payment of two dollars on every hundred dollars of the amount of that part of the Public Debt which bears an actual interest of six per cent, the said payment to be made on the — day of — next.

The committee further report, that it would, in their opinion, be expedient to appropriate, until the year 1801, all the revenues arising from the duties and taxes on manufactured sugar and snuff, on licenses for retailing wines and spirituous liquors, on sales at auction, and on carriages, to the payment of so much of the Public Debt as the Government shall annually have a right to redeem, and for that purpose to prolong the duration of the said duties and taxes to the year 1801. They therefore recommend the following resolution:

Resolved. That the several clauses of limitation in the acts for laying duties and taxes on manufactured sugar and snuff, on licenses for retailing wines and spirituous liquors, on sales at auction, and on carriages, be repealed; that the said several acts be continued in force until the year 1801, and that the moneys arising therefrom be appropriated to the discharge of that portion of the Public Debt which is redeemable by law—subject, however, to a substitution of other duties or taxes of equal value, to all or any of the said duties and taxes.

PUBLIC CREDIT.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, January 16, 1795.
SIR: I beg leave, through you, to inform the Senate, that, pursuant to the 2d section of the act establishing the Treasury Department, which expressly makes it the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury "to digest and prepare plans for the improvement and management of the revenue and for the support of Public Credit," I have digested and prepared a plan, on the basis of the actual revenue, for the further support of Public Credit, which is ready for communication to the Senate.

This plan embraces a further provision for the Subscribed Debt; a provision for converting, with the consent of the creditors, the Foreign into the Domestic Debt; a provision for augmenting the Sinking Fund; so as to render it commensurate with the entire Debt of the United States; suggestions for giving effect to the act of the last session, granting a million of dollars for the purposes of foreign intercourse; with some auxiliary propositions.

With perfect respect, I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

ALEXANDER HAMILTON,
*Secretary of the Treasury,

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, January 20, 1795.

SIR: Agreeably to the order of the Senate, I have the honor to transmit the plan for the support of Public Credit, announced in my Letter of the 16th instant, together with sundry statements connected with it; and to be your most obedient servant,

A. HAMILTON.
*To the Vice President of the United States

The Secretary of the Treasury respectfully makes the following Report to the Senate:

The President of the United States, with that provident concern for the public welfare which characterizes all his conduct, was pleased, in his Speech to the two Houses of Congress, at the opening of the present session, to invite their attention to the adoption of a definitive plan for the redemption of the Public Debt, and to the consummation of whatsoever may remain unfinished of our system of Public Credit, in order to place that Credit, as far as may be practicable, on grounds which cannot be disturbed, and to prevent that progressive accumulation of Debt, which must ultimately endanger all Government.

It was, at the same time, very justly intimated, that the period which has elapsed since the commencement of our fiscal measures, (now more than four years,) has so far developed our resources, as to open the way to the important work. And it is matter of solid consolation that the result, presenting a state of our finances, prosperous beyond expectation, solicits the public councils to enter, with zeal and decision, upon measures commensurate with the greatness of the interests to be promoted.

Under the influence of this conviction, in conformity with the suggestions of the President, and pursuant to the duty which the constitution of the Department, as by law established, enjoins upon the Secretary of the Treasury, he has employed himself in digesting and preparing the materials of a plan for the attainment of the invaluable ends which are recommended. And he now respectfully submits them to the consideration of Congress.

Towards a clear and distinct conception of the means necessary to the accomplishment of these ends, it will be useful, in the first place, to review what has been heretofore done. This will be presented under three heads:

I. The revenues which have been established;
 II. The provisions for funding the Debt, and for the payment of interest upon it;
 III. The provisions for reimbursing and extinguishing the Debt.

I. The revenues which have been established appear in the following acts:

1st. "An act for laying a duty on goods, wares, and merchandises, imported into the United States," passed June the 1st, 1789. This act, as its title imports, lays various specific and ad valorem rates on all articles (with exception of a few useful to agriculture and manufactures) imported from foreign countries. The lowest ad valorem rate is 5 per cent., with a discount of 10 per cent. in favor of our own bottoms. The duration assigned these duties was the end of the session of Congress next succeeding the 1st day of June, 1796.

2d. "An act imposing duties on tonnage," passed July 20, 1789.

This act lays various rates of duty on the tonnage of ships and vessels entered in the United States from foreign countries, and, in certain cases, in one part of the United States to another.

Its duration was indefinite, no limit having been assigned.

3d. "An act imposing duties on the tonnage of ships and vessels," passed July 20, 1790.

This act is a substitute for the one last mentioned, preserving the same rates of duty, but applying them, in some instances differently. It is, like the former, of indefinite duration.

4th. "An act making further provision for the payment of the Debts of the United States," passed August 10, 1790.

This act repeals, after the last of December, 1790, the duties on imported articles, laid by the act above cited, and substitutes new and generally increased rates, specific and ad valorem.

The lowest ad valorem rate in this, as in the former act, is five per cent.; but the number of articles to which it applies is much narrowed; and, instead of a discount in favor of our own bottoms, an addition of 10 per cent. is made to the disadvantage of foreign bottoms.

The number of free articles is somewhat extended, in further encouragement of agriculture and manufactures.

It is declared that the duties laid by this act shall continue till the Debts and purposes for which they are appropriated shall be satisfied; reserving, however, a right to Congress to substitute other duties or taxes of equal value.

5th. "An act to incorporate the subscribers to the Bank of the United States," passed the 25th of February, 1791.

The second section of this act authorizes the President to cause a subscription to be made to the stock of the Bank, on account of the United States, to the amount of $2,000,000; and, with a view to the accomplishment of that object, to borrow of the Bank $2,000,000, to be reimbursed in ten equal yearly instalments.

The difference between the interest payable on the Loan and the dividend on the stock, constitutes an item of annual income to the United States. It is unappropriated.

6th. "An act repealing, after the last day of June next, the duties heretofore laid upon distilled spirits imported from abroad, and laying others in their stead; and, also, upon spirits distilled within the United States, and for appropriating the same," passed the 3d of March, 1791.

This act, in conformity with its title, repeals, after June, 1791, the duties on imported spirits, laid by the act of the 10th of August, 1790, and establishes, in lieu of them, higher rates, namely, from 20 to 40 cents per gallon, according to proof. It also lays duties, to commence at the same time, upon spirits distilled within the United States; namely, on those from foreign materials from 11 to 30 cents, according to proof; on those from domestic materials, if distilled in cities, towns, or villages, from 9 to 25 cents per gallon, according to proof; if distilled in other places, it imposes a yearly rate of 60 cents per gallon of the capacity of each still, with an option to the distiller to keep and render an account of the produce of his still, and to pay 9 cents per gallon of the quantity of spirits distilled therein.

These duties are appropriated, primarily, in the same manner and to the same purposes as those laid on imported articles by the act of the 10th of August, 1790, and are to continue for the same time, with the like reservation of a right to substitute other duties or taxes of equal value. There is a further appropriation, which will be noticed hereafter.

7th. "An act for raising a further sum of money for the protection of the frontiers, and for other purposes therein mentioned," passed May 3, 1792.

This act repeals, after June, 1792, the former duties on a number of imported articles, and establishes higher duties in their stead.

It extends, among other things, the duties on foreign distilled spirits, laying on those made from grain 28 to 50 cents per gallon; on others 25 to 46 cents per gallon. The appropriation and duration of these new duties are conformable and co-extensive with those repealed. There is, likewise, an addition of 24 per cent. to that class of duties ad valorem, which before was rated at 5 per cent., but this additional duty is limited to the term of two years.

Out of the surplus of these duties, after satisfying the permanent appropriations, certain gross sums are appropriated for the service of the War Department.

8th. "An act concerning the duties on spirits distilled within the United States," passed May 8, 1792.

This act repeals, after the last day of June, 1792, the former duties on spirits distilled within the United States and on stills, and, instead of them, establishes lower duties, namely, on those made of foreign materials, from 10 to 25 cents per gallon, according to proof; on those made of domestic materials, if in cities, towns, or villages, or at distilleries, where the stills, singly or together, are of the capacity of 400 gallons or upwards, from 7 to 18 cents per gallon of the spirits distilled, according to the proof; if made in other places, or at distilleries where the stills are of inferior capacity, the yearly rate of 54 cents per gallon of the capacity of each still. A new option is given to the distiller, which is, instead of paying the yearly rate, to take out licenses for the monthly employment of his stills, paying each time 10 cents per gallon of the capacity of each still.

These new duties are appropriated in the same manner, and for the same purposes, and are to continue for the same time, as those for which they are substitutes; and, to make good any deficiency which may accrue from lowering the rates, the surplus of the duties imposed by the act of the 2d of the same month is appropriated.

"An act to promote the progress of Useful Arts, and to repeal the act heretofore made for that purpose," passed February 21, 1793.

This act ordains certain fees to be paid by persons to whom patents are granted for inventions, discoveries, or improvements, and appropriates them to the purpose of defraying clerk-hire in the Department of State. Its duration is indefinite.

9th. "An act to establish the Post Office and Post Roads within the United States," passed May 8, 1794.

This act establishes, to commence on the 1st of June following, various rates of postage on letters, and directs that the Postmaster shall render to the Treasury Department a quarterly account of receipts and expenditures, and shall pay, quarterly, into the Treasury, the balance in his hands.

The duration of this act is also indefinite. It contains no appropriation of the sums paid into the Treasury.

10th. "An act laying duties upon carriages for the conveyance of persons," passed June 5, 1794.

This act lays different rates of duty, from $10 down to $1, upon carriages for the conveyance of persons, kept by or for any person, for his or her own use, or to be let to hire, or for the conveying of passengers; and, to guard against misapprehension, declares, that the duties shall not be construed to extend to any carriage usually and chiefly employed in husbandry, or for the transporting or carrying of goods, wares, merchandise, produce, or commodities.

Public Credit.

The duration of the duties is limited to the end of the session of Congress which shall be next after the term of two years from the time of passing the act. It contains no appropriation.

11th. "An act laying duties on licenses for selling wines and foreign distilled spirituous liquors by retail," passed June 5, 1794.

This act requires that every retail dealer in wines shall take out a yearly license, and shall pay for it a duty of $5; and that every retail dealer in foreign distilled spirituous liquors shall also take out a yearly license, and pay for it a duty of $5. It defines a retail dealer in wines to be a person who deals in the selling of wines, to be carried or sent out of the house, building, or place of his or her dwelling, in less quantities at one time than thirty gallons, except in the original cask, case, box, or package, in which it is imported. A retail dealer of spirituous liquors to be a person who shall deal in the selling of foreign distilled spirituous liquors, to be carried or sent out of the house, building, or place of his or her dwelling, in less quantities than twenty gallons at one time. No difference is made between the dealer in several kinds of wine, or several kinds of foreign distilled liquors, and the dealer in one kind.

The same duration is assigned to this act as to the one last cited. It is equally without an appropriation.

12th. "An act laying certain duties upon snuff and refined sugar," passed June 5, 1794.

This act lays a duty of 8 cents per pound on all snuff, which, after the 30th of September, 1794, should be manufactured within the United States, and of 2 cents per pound on all sugar which, after that day, should be refined within the United States. The remark made upon the two last recited acts is applicable to this, as to the duration of the duties, and the appropriation of their proceeds.

13th. "An act laying additional duties on goods, wares, and merchandises, imported into the United States," passed June 7, 1794.

This act lays upon sundry enumerated articles, on their importation from foreign countries, certain specific and ad valorem rates of duty, in addition to those before charged upon them, and adds generally a duty of two and a half per centum on all that class of articles which were before chargeable with seven and a half per centum ad valorem. It also prolongs the temporary two and a half per centum, laid by the act of May 2, 1792, till the 1st of January, 1797, to which period the other duties laid by it are to continue. It contains no appropriation.

14. "An act laying duties on property sold at auction," passed June 9, 1794.

This act lays a duty on sales at auction, by persons licensed according to the laws of a State or of one prohibiting others from selling at auction, of one quarter per cent. of the purchase money arising from the sale of any right, interest, or estate, in lands, tenements, or hereditaments, utensils in husbandry, farming stock, or ships and vessels, of one half per cent. of the purchase money arising from the sales of any other goods, chattels, rights, or credits.

The term of these duties is limited to the end of the session next after the expiration of two years from the time of passing the act, which also is without an appropriation.

But by an act, entitled "An act making appropriations for certain purposes therein expressed," passed the same 9th of June, 1794, certain specific sums, amounting together to $1,292,137 88, are charged upon the proceeds of the revenues which are created by the five last mentioned acts, and there is a reservation made out of them of a sum sufficient to pay the interest of whatever moneys may be borrowed pursuant to the act, entitled "An act making further provision for the expenses attending the intercourse of the United States with foreign nations," &c., passed the 20th of March, 1794, which sum is pledged for the payment of that interest.

These acts comprehend all the current revenues of the United States. Their product will appear hereafter.

In addition to them a fund will be derived from the sale of the public lands in the Western Territory. And there likewise occur, from time to time, payments into the Treasury on account of old debts; but these are too casual and of too little magnitude to be more than cursorily mentioned.

The lands in the Western Territory, of which the Government of the United States has acquired the right of soil, are estimated, in a report of the late Secretary of State, to amount to 21,000,000 of acres. This quantity, at 20 cents per acre, the price upon former occasions contemplated, would yield a sum of $4,200,000. But it is believed that it would be unsafe to count upon so large a sum. Besides, the uncertainty as to the proportion which may be of a saleable quality, and as to the price which may be obtained for it, the boundary line between the United States and the Indians is understood to be unsettled with regard to a large part of the tract on which the computation is made. If it ultimately yields $3,000,000, it will probably equal every reasonable expectation.

II. The provisions for funding the Debt, and for payment of interest upon it, are comprised in the following acts:

1st. "An act making provision for the Debt of the United States," passed August 4, 1790.

This act, commonly called the Funding Act, contains these several provisions, viz:

1. It reserves out of the proceeds of the duties on imports and tonnage, for the support of the Government of the United States, and their common defence, the yearly sum of $600,000.

2. It appropriates so much of the same proceeds as should be necessary to the payment of interest on Foreign Loans, before that time contracted, or which should afterwards be contracted, for discharging the arrears of interest, and the principal of antecedent Foreign Loans, to continue so appropriated till the Debt created by those Loans should be fully discharged.

3. It authorizes the President to borrow any sum or sums, not exceeding $12,000,000, to discharge the arrears of interest upon and the instalments of the principal of the Foreign Debt, due and to grow due; and if to be effected on advantageous terms, to pay off the whole of that Debt; and further authorizes him to make such other contracts respecting it as should be found for the interest of the United States, so that no engagement or contract should preclude from reimbursing the sum borrowed within fifteen years after they should be borrowed.

4. In order to adapt the form of the Domestic Debt to the then circumstances of the United States, as far as should be found practicable, "consistently with good faith and the rights of creditors," which it truly declares, "could only be done by a voluntary Loan on their part," it proposes a Loan to the United States, (directing, for that purpose, books for subscriptions to be opened at the Treasury, and by Commissioners of Loans in the several States, on the 1st of October, 1790, and to continue for a year,) the sums subscribed to the Loan to be paid in certain enumerated evidences of the Debt of the United States, upon these terms, viz:

First. That the interest unpaid on the principal of those evidences should be computed up to the last of December, 1790.

Second. That, for any sum subscribed and paid in the principal of the Debt, the subscriber should be entitled to one certificate for a sum equal to two-thirds of the sum subscribed, bearing an interest of 6 per cent. per annum, commencing the 1st day of January, 1791, payable quarter-yearly, and subject to redemption by payments not exceeding, in one year, on account of both principal and interest, $8 upon a hundred of both principal sum so subscribed and paid; and to another certificate for a sum equal to the remaining third of that sum, which, after the year 1800, should bear a like interest, payable in like manner, and subject to a like rate of redemption; but that the United States, though having a right to redeem in the above mentioned proportion, should not be obliged to do it.

Third. That for any sum subscribed and paid in the interest of the Debt, the subscriber should be entitled to a certificate for a sum equal to the sum subscribed, bearing an interest of 3 per cent. per annum, from the said last day of December, 1790, payable quarter-yearly, and redeemable at pleasure, by payment of the principal.

Fourth. That the new stock created by the said Loan should be transferable on the books upon which the credit for it should stand by the proprietor or his attorney; these books to be either those kept for the purpose at the Treasury, or by the Commissioners of Loans in the respective States; a mode being provided for the transfer from the books at one place to those at another.

Fifth. That the interest should be payable whosoever the credit for the stock should exist, when the payment of the interest should become due; except that the dividend of interest for any quarter of a year which should not be demanded before the expiration of a third quarter, should afterwards be demandable only at the Treasury.

Sixth. That, for the regular payment of the interest on the several kinds of stock to arise from the Loan, as it should accrue, including that which is deferred, the proceeds of the public revenues, which, before that time, had been, or, during the then session, should be provided, after reserving yearly, $800,000, for the support of the Government of the United States, and their common defence, and such sum as should be necessary for payment of interest on the Foreign Loans before mentioned should be, and thereby were, pledged and appropriated till the final redemption of the capital stock.

5. Premising that some of the creditors of the United States might not think fit to become subscribers to the Loan, this act declares that "nothing contained in it should be construed in anywise to alter, abridge, or impair the rights of those creditors of the United States who should not subscribe to the Loan or the contracts upon which their respective claims are founded, but that the said contracts and rights should remain in full force and virtue." And to obviate all idea of compulsion on the creditors to subscribe, it allows to non-subscribers, during the pendency of the Loan, and until the end of the year 1791, a rate per centum, on their respective demands, equal to that which is paid to subscribing creditors; on the sole condition, that the evidences of Debt held by them, except those which had been issued by the Register of the Treasury, for the registered Debt, should be exchanged for other certificates, specifying the specie amount of those in exchange, for which they were given, and otherwise of the like tenor with those which had therefore been issued by the Register of the Treasury, for the registered Debt; stating, as the grounds of this condition, that some of the certificates then in circulation, had not been liquidated to specie value; that most of them were greatly subject to counterfeits; that counterfeiters had actually taken place in numerous instances; and that embarrassment and imposition might attend the payment of interest on these certificates in their then form.

6. This act likewise proposes another Loan, to the amount of $31,500,000, payable in the principal and interest, indiscriminately, of the evidences of Debt of the respective States, according to certain quotas, to be conducted in the same manner, and to be open for the same time, as that in the Domestic Debt of the United States. The terms of this Loan to be:

First.—That, for any sum subscribed, the subscriber should be entitled to one certificate, for a sum equal to four-ninths of the subscribed sum, bearing an interest of six per centum per annum, commencing the 1st day of January, 1791. To another certificate, for a sum equal to two-ninths of the said subscribed sum, bearing an interest, after the year 1800, of six per centum per annum; and, to a third certificate, for a sum equal to three-ninths of the said subscribed sum, bearing an interest of three per centum per annum, commencing on the same first day of January, 1791: the inter-rest, in each case, to be payable in like manner, and to be subject to the like redemption as that on the correspondent kinds of stock to be created by this, the said first-mentioned Loan. And the stock to be created by this second Loan, to be transferable on the same principles, and in the same modes, as that produced by the former.

Second.—That, for the regular payment of interest on the several kinds of stock to arise from this Loan, as it should accrue, including that which is deferred, the proceeds of the public revenues, which, before that time, had been, or during the then session should be, provided, after reserving the aforesaid yearly sum of $600,000 the sum necessary for payment of interest on the Foreign Loans made, and to be made, and the sum necessary for payment of interest on the Loan in the Domestic Debt, should be, and thereby were, pledged and appropriated; to continue so pledged and appropriated until the final redemption of the capital stock.

7. To secure the due application of these revenues, according to the appropriations, an account of them is directed to be kept, distinct from that of the proceeds of any other revenues, except such as should be raised to make good a deficiency in those; and the faith of the United States is pledged to appropriate additional and permanent funds, for satisfying such deficiency.

8. The proceeds of the sales of lands in the Western Territory, then belonging, or which there-after should belong, to the United States, are pledged and appropriated for the discharge of the Debts which the United States then owed, or by virtue of that act should owe.

There are several collateral and supplementary provisions, which are omitted, as immaterial to the intended view of the subject.

2d. "An act repealing, after the last day of June next, the duties heretofore laid upon distilled spirits, &c.," passed the 3d of March, 1791.

The proceeds of the duties, laid by this act, are made subject to the same appropriations, and in the same order of priority, as those contained in the Funding Act; and, to secure their due application, an account is directed to be kept of them, distinct from that of any other revenues, except those appropriated by the Funding Act.

3d. "An act for raising a further sum of money for the protection of the frontiers, &c.," passed May 2, 1792.

This act, which, as has been before noticed, increased permanently the duties on certain imported articles, and laid a temporary additional duty on some others, appropriates, primarily, the proceeds of the permanent augmentations, in the same manner, and to the same purposes, as the antecedent duties were appropriated; that is, in conformity with the Funding Act.

4th. "An act concerning the duties on spirits distilled within the United States," passed May 8, 1792.

This act, which lowers the duties on spirits distilled within the United States, and on stills, appropriates the proceeds of the reduced duties in the same manner as were the former duties; and, to make good whatever deficiency might be occasioned by the reduction of the rates, pledges, as a substitute, the surplus of the augmented duties laid by the last cited act.

5th. "An act providing for the payment of the second instalment due on a Loan made of the Bank of the United States," passed June 4, 1794.

This act, in addition to a provision for paying that second instalment, appropriates so much of the dividends on the stock which the United States hold in the Bank, as should be necessary to the payment of interest on the capital of a Loan of $2,000,000, had of the Bank, pursuant to the 11th section of the act by which it is incorporated. It also fixes the last day of December, in each year, as the annual period for the payment of the successive instalments of that Loan.

6th. "An act making provision for the payment of the interest on the balances due to certain States, upon a final settlement of accounts between the United States and the individual States," passed May 30, 1794.

This act directs that interest shall be allowed and computed on the balances to creditor States, from the last of December, 1789, to the last of December, 1794; which, being placed to their credit respectively, shall bear an interest of three per centum per annum, from the period last mentioned.

It further directs that the interests on the principal balances, to be funded agreeably to the terms of the act for the settlement of accounts, together with the interest upon the arrears of interest, computed on those balances, and forming a new capital, shall be payable at the offices of the Commissioners of Loans, within the States to which the balances are respectively due, and shall be paid quarterly yearly after the last day of December, 1794, at the same epochs in each year, at which interest is payable, on the other parts of the Funded Debt: to which end, so much of the proceeds of the duties on imports and tonnage, as may be necessary, and as were not otherwise previously appropriated, are appropriated; and the faith of the United States is pledged to provide for any deficiency which may happen by additional and permanent funds.

There are several acts which prolong, from time to time, the subscriptions in the Domestic and State Debts, on the same terms as by the Funding Act, those in the Domestic Debt being continued down to the last day of December, 1794; which acts, together with the acts particularly cited, comprise all those that relate to the funding of the Public Debt, and the payment of interest thereupon. The result of these acts is exhibited in the tables A, B, C, and D, which show the amount of the Foreign Debt; that of the Funded Debt, the probable amount of that which remains unfunded, of what composed, and the annual amount of interest upon the different portions of Debt, according to contract, and according to the plan of this report.

III. The provisions for reimbursing and redeeming the Public Debt, are contained in the following acts, and are as follows, viz:

1st. "An act making provision for the Debt of the United States," passed the 4th of August, 1790.

Public Credit.

This act, which is the one that regulates the funding of the Debt, by the last section appropriates the proceeds of the sales of the lands in the Western Territory, then belonging, or thereafter to belong, to the United States, to the sinking or discharging of the Debts for which the United States then were, or by virtue of that act should be, holden, to be applied solely to that use, until they should be fully satisfied.

2d. "An act making provision for the reduction of the Public Debt," passed August 12, 1790.

This act, premising that it is desirable, by all just and proper means, to effect a reduction of the Public Debt, and that the application of the surplus revenue to that object, will not only contribute to this desirable end, but will be beneficial to the creditors of the United States, by raising the price of their stock, and be productive of considerable saving to the United States, enacts—

1. That the surplus of the duties on imports and tonnage, to the end of the year 1790, shall be applied to the purchase of the Debt of the United States, at its market price, if not exceeding the par or true value thereof.

2. That the purchases to be made shall be conducted under the direction of the President of the Senate, the Chief Justice, the Secretary of State, the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Attorney General, who, or any three of whom, with the approbation of the President, are authorized to cause them to be made, in such manner, and under such regulations, as shall appear to them best calculated to fulfil the intent of this act: Provided, That the same should be made openly, and with due regard to the equal benefit of the several States.

3. That the accounts of the application of the Fund should be settled as other public accounts, accompanied with returns of the amount of Debt, purchased at the end of each quarter of a year; and that a full and exact report of the proceedings of the Commissioners should be laid before Congress, within the first fourteen days of each session, including a statement of the disbursements and purchases, specifying the times when, prices at which, and persons of whom, the purchases were made.

4. That, in addition to this fund, the President should be authorized to borrow any sum or sums, not exceeding $2,000,000, at an interest not exceeding five per centum, to be applied to purchases of Public Debt, in like manner, and under the same direction and regulations as the first mentioned fund: Provided, That, out of the interest of the Debt to be purchased, there should be appropriated, annually, a sum not exceeding eight per centum of the sums borrowed, towards paying the interest and reimbursing the principal of these sums.

But, to guard against the possibility of a deficiency of means to pay the interest on the Debt which was to accrue in the year 1791, authority is given to reserve and apply to that purpose, out of the first mentioned fund, as much as might be necessary to supply the defect of receipts, during that year, on account of the duties which should accrue after the year 1790.

3d. "An act repealing, after the last day of June next, the duties heretofore laid upon distilled spirits, &c.," passed the 3d of March, 1791.

This act appropriates whatever surplus may remain, from year to year, of the proceeds of the duties which it imposes, after satisfying prior appropriations, to the reduction of the Public Debt, unless such surplus shall be required for the current public exigencies, and, by special acts of Congress, shall be appropriated thereto.

4th. "An act supplementary to the act making provision for the reduction of the Public Debt," passed the 3d day of March, 1791.

This act declares that the terms of a Loan of three millions of florins, obtained in Holland, bearing five per cent. interest, and four and a half per cent. for charges, and future Loans on the same terms, should be deemed to be within the meaning of the act of the 12th of August, 1790.

5th. "An act supplementary to the act making provision for the Debt of the United States," passed May 8, 1792.

This act makes provision for the payment of a debt due to certain foreign officers who had served the United States, (the interest of which was, by stipulation, payable at Paris,) out of the moneys authorized to be borrowed by the Funding Act. It also establishes a permanent Sinking Fund, to be composed—

1. Of the interest of the Public Debt purchased, redeemed, or paid into the Treasury, in satisfaction of any debt or demand.

2. Of the surplus, if any, which should remain of the moneys appropriated for paying the interest of the Public Debt, after paying that interest.

This Fund is to be applied, under the direction of the Commissioners nominated in the act of the 12th of August, with the like approbation of the President—

First.—To the purchase of the several species of stock constituting the Debt of the United States, at their respective market prices, not exceeding the par or true value thereof, and, as nearly as may be, in equal proportions, until the annual amount of the fund shall be equal to two per centum of the whole amount of the outstanding Funded Stock, bearing a present interest of six per centum: Thenceforth—

Second.—To the redemption of that stock, according to the right reserved to the United States, until the whole should be redeemed: and, lastly, after such redemption, to the purchase, at its market price, of any unredeemed Debt of the United States; which purchases are directed to be made at the lowest prices at which they can be effected by open purchases, or by receiving sealed proposals, to be opened in the presence of the Commissioners, or persons authorized by them to make purchases, and of the persons making the proposals; and are to be accounted for at the Treasury, and reported to Congress, in the same manner as the purchases before authorized to be made.

Public Credit.

6th. "An act making appropriations for the support of Government, for the year 1793." This act provides that the President of the United States shall cause so much of the Loan made of the Bank of the United States, pursuant to the 11th section of the act of incorporation, to be paid off, in sums not less than $50,000, as, in his opinion, the state of the Treasury may, from time to time, admit, out of any moneys which may be in the Treasury, having due regard to the exigencies of the Government, and the appropriations made, and to be made, by law.

7th. "An act making provision for the payment of the first instalment due on a Loan made of the Bank of the United States," passed March 23, 1793.

This act authorizes the payment of the first instalment of a Loan of two millions of dollars, had of the Bank of the United States, pursuant to the 11th section of the act by which it is incorporated, out of the moneys borrowed upon the authority of the act making provision for the reduction of the Public Debt.

8th. "An act providing for the payment of the second instalment, due on a Loan made of the Bank of the United States," passed June 4, 1794.

This act authorizes the payment of that second instalment, out of the proceeds of any Foreign Loans before that time transferred to the United States. It makes other provisions, which have been noticed under a preceding head.

These acts comprise all the provisions which have been made for reimbursing and redeeming the Debt of the United States. The result, to the last of December, 1794, is presented in the statement E.

There are two other acts, which, though not falling properly under either of the foregoing heads, require, from their relation to the subject, to be brought into view.

1. An act relative to claims against the United States, not barred by any act of limitation, and which have not been already adjusted, passed February 12, 1793.

This act directs that all claims of the description given in the title shall be presented at the Treasury for adjustment, by the 1st of May, 1794, or shall be for ever after barred; except those for Loan Office certificates, final settlements, indentures of interest, Register's certificates, balances on the books of the Treasury, Loans of money in foreign countries, certificates issued under the act, entitled "An act making provision for the Debt of the United States."

Such of the claims presented as cannot be admitted in the course of the Treasury, are to be reported to Congress, by the accounting officers.

Among the claims inadmissible in the ordinary course of the Treasury, is a sum of $90,574, of the bills of credit, commonly called new emission money.

2. An act making further provision for the expenses attending the intercourse of the United States with foreign nations, &c., passed March 20, 1794.

This act appropriates, in addition to former provisions, one million of dollars for the purposes mentioned in the title, to be paid out of any moneys which may be in the Treasury, not otherwise appropriated, and to be applied under the direction of the President of the United States, who is also authorized, if necessary, to borrow the whole, or any part of the sum; but there is no special appropriation either for paying the interest or reimbursing the principal of the Loan.

The act already quoted, of the 9th of June, 1794, entitled "An act making appropriations for certain purposes therein expressed," with a view to remedy this defect, appropriates, out of the proceeds of the taxes laid during the last session, such sum as shall be sufficient to pay the interest on whatever moneys may be borrowed, pursuant to the act of March 20, 1794.

The foregoing review of the laws which constitute the fiscal system of the United States displays these prominent points as the leading features of that system:

1st. That all the current revenues of the United States are derived from these sources, to wit: imported articles; the tonnage of ships and vessels; spirits distilled within the United States, and stills; the postage of letters; fees on patents; dividends of Bank stock; snuff manufactured within the United States; sugar refined within the United States; sales at auction; licenses to retail wines and distilled spirits; carriages for the conveyance of persons.

2d. That, of these revenues, the principal part of the duties on imported articles, those on the tonnage of ships and vessels, those on distilled spirits and stills, those on the postage of letters, patent fees, the dividends on Bank stock, are permanent, (the three first being commensurate with the existence of the Debt for the payment of the interest of which they are pledged, the fourth and fifth having no limit assigned in the laws, and the last being commensurate with the duration of the proceeding in the stock,) all the others temporary; being limited to continue no longer than till the end of the session of Congress next after the expiration of two years from the respective times of passing the laws which established them, except the temporary duties on imports and tonnage, which are to continue till the 1st of January, 1797.

3d. That the permanent duties on imported articles, the tonnage duties, the duties on spirits distilled within the United States, and on stills, are subject to these permanent dispositions:

1. To an annual reservation of $600,000, for the support of the Government of the United States and their common defence.

2. To an appropriation of so much as may be necessary to pay the interest on the Foreign Loans provided for by the Funding Act.

3. To an appropriation of so much as may be necessary to pay the interest on the stock created by the Loan in Domestic Debt, or, more properly, in the original Debt of the United States.

4. To an appropriation of so much as may be necessary to discharge the interest on the stock created by the Loan in the debts of the respective States.

Public Credit.

5. To an appropriation of so much as may be necessary to pay the interest on the balances due to creditor States, which dispositions establish priorities, according to the order in which they are here enumerated.

4th. That the surplus, if any, of the duties on spirits distilled within the United States, and on stills, has an ultimate appropriation, that is, to the reduction of the Public Debt; but that the surpluses of the other duties have no such ultimate appropriation.

5th. That the duties on the postage of letters and the net dividend on Bank stock have no permanent or particular appropriation.

6th. That the temporary duties are charged with a specific sum of $1,292,137 38, and with the payment of interest on a sum of $1,000,000, authorized to be borrowed for the expenses of foreign intercourse.

7th. That the whole of the Foreign Debt, and all that part of the Domestic Debt, being now nearly the whole, which consists of the stock created by the Loans in the original Debt of the United States, and in the particular debts of the several States, and by the balances due to creditor States, are bottomed on certain specified revenues, pledged or hypothecated for the payment of the interest upon them, and thus constitute the Funded Debt of the United States.

8th. That the Funded Domestic Debt of the United States consists of three species of stock—one bearing a present interest of six per cent. per annum; another bearing a like interest after the year 1800; a third bearing a present interest of three per cent. per annum—the interest in each case payable quarterly yearly.

9th. That the six per cent. stock, present and deferred, can be redeemed in no greater proportion than at the rate of eight per centum per annum of the original sum, on account both of principal and interest; but the three per cent. stock is redeemable at pleasure.

10. That the provision for subscribing to the Loan in Domestic Debt expired on the last of December, 1794, and that no further provision has been made for the unsubscribed residue.

11th. That the Funding Act expressly confirms the contracts and rights of the creditors of the United States, who shall not think fit to subscribe to the Loan, and gives an expectation to them of further and other arrangements, upon the event of the propositions made to them.

12th. That the proceeds of all the lands of the United States in the Western Territory are appropriated to the redemption of all that part of the Public Debt for which, prior to the Funding Act, or by virtue thereof, the United States were or are liable.

13th. That, in addition to this, a regular Sinking Fund has been successively constituted, to be applied under the direction of five principal officers of the United States, with the approbation of the President, hitherto composed of three parts—1st, the surplus of the duties on imports and tonnage to the end of 1790; 2dly, the proceeds of Loans not exceeding $2,000,000, authorized to be borrowed for the purpose, (these two funds to be invested in purchases;) and, 3dly, (in which the two former resolve themselves,) the interest on the Public Debt, purchased, redeemed, or paid into the Treasury, together with the surpluses, if any, of moneys appropriated for interest, to be applied first to purchases of the Debt, till the fund is equal to two per centum of the outstanding stock, bearing a present interest of six per cent.; second, to the redemption of that stock; and, lastly, to purchases of any unredeemed residue of the Public Debt. But there is reserved out of this fund a sum not exceeding eight per centum per annum towards the payment of interest and reimbursing of the principal of the Loans made for purchases of the Debt.

To this recapitulation of the leading features of our Fiscal System, it may be useful to add a summary exhibition of certain results, which appear more in detail, or are deducible from the tables or statements annexed to this report.

The particulars and amount of the Debt of the United States are as follows:

This sum is liable to be increased by the interest which will begin to accrue on the deferred stock the first of January, 1801; being, on the present amount of that stock, $871,401 92.

The annual force of the Sinking Fund, as depending on ascertained funds, may be stated as follows:

Total unredeemed Debt	$78,096,468 67	Interest for a year, on sums already carried to its credit	$68,225 55
This is exclusive of a sum of $1,400,000 due to the Bank of the United States, on account of the Loan of $2,000,000 had of that institution, pursuant to the eleventh section of the act by which it is incorporated, and which is not included in the mass of the Debt, because it is more than counterbalanced by a greater value in stock. It is also exclusive of those Loans which are temporary anticipations of the revenue. Of transferable stock - $516,410 24

Public Credit.

Of untransferable stock, arising from balances to creditor States	46,901 12
Total	$563,311 36
The sum applicable, in the first instance, (that is, on the first day of January, 1802,) to the redemption of that portion of the Funded Debt now called deferred stock, excluding that standing to the credit of the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund, will be as follows:
Of transferable stock	$249,576 75
Of untransferable stock, arising from balances to creditor States	23,450 56
Total	$273,027 31

These sums would complete the redemption of the whole amount of the stock to which they are applicable, within twenty-three years after the redemption in each case was begun; within which terms they would discharge the whole of the Public Debt, except the Foreign Debt, the unsubscribed Debt, and the three per cent. stock.

If the redemption of the present six per cent. stock commence the first of January, 1796, and the redeeming fund be commensurate with the whole of the unredeemed stock bearing a present interest of six per cent., and transferable, the revenue set free in the year 1818, for operations upon the residue of the Debt, will be $2,039,394 36.

If the redemption of the Deferred Debt commence the first of January, 1802, when it may rightfully commence, and the redeeming fund be commensurate with the whole of that stock, unredeemed and transferable, the revenue set free in the year 1824, for operations upon the residue of the Public Debt, if any remain, will be $998,307 02.

The revenue set free by these successive redemptions, would be sufficient to redeem the whole of the present Foreign Debt in six years; that is, within a term of twenty-eight years from the proposed time for commencing the redemption, or the first of January, 1796; and, after extinguishing the Foreign Debt, would more than discharge the whole of the balances to creditor States, and the whole of the unfunded Debt, in two years more.

If the proceeds of the lands in the Western territory should be equal to three millions of dollars, and the three per cent. stock can be purchased at an average of twelve shillings in the pound, that fund would suffice to pay off the principal of the three per cent. stock, in something more than twenty-five years.

It follows, that, if the force of the Sinking Fund be rendered equal, exclusive of the proceeds of the sales of Western lands, to the redemption of the present unredeemed transferable stock, commencing the 1st of January, 1796, as to that bearing a present interest of 6 per centum, and the 1st of January, 1802, as to that bearing a future interest of 6 per centum; and if the proceeds of the sales of Western lands should prove equal to 3,000,000 of dollars, and can be brought into action for purchasers of the 3 per cent. stock, at the rate above mentioned, at any time before the year 1801, the whole of the present Debt of the United States, Foreign and Domestic, (the funds appropriated being, during the whole period, adequate, in productiveness, and inviolably applied) would be extinguished in thirty years. And there would then revert to the United States, an annual income of 4,435,320 dollars and 89 cents. Some auxiliary provisions, which will be proposed, may greatly accelerate that result.*

On the basis of the foregoing data, the Secretary of the Treasury proceeds to submit to the consideration of Congress, certain propositions, which appear to him necessary to be adopted to complete our system of public credit. These will be followed by some explanatory remarks.

I. PROPOSITION.

That further provision be made, with regard to the yet unsubscribed Debt of the United States, as follows:

1st. Further time to be given, until the end of the year 1795, to subscribe the same to the Loan proposed by the Funding Act; with liberty to the holders to subscribe the arrears of interest up to that period, separately from the principal, reserving that principal on its original footing.

2d. An appropriation to be made for payment of interest on so much of the principal (excepting Loan Office certificates bearing interest on the nominal value) as, at the end of the year 1795, shall remain unsubscribed, for the term of one year, according to the rate or rates stipulated by the original contracts, and for the payment of ten per centum of the arrears of interest thereupon, to the same end of the year 1795. This payment to be made on the 1st of January, 1796, at the Treasury, where no particular place of payment is stipulated, and at such place, where there is one.

3d. The specie principal of the Loan Office certificates, which bear interest on the nominal value, together with the arrears of interest, to be immediately paid off.

II. PROPOSITION.

That provision be made for taking, upon Loan to the United States, by subscription at the Treasury, the outstanding and unbarred new emission bills of credit, the sums subscribed to be paid in the principal only of those bills, and stock of the new Loan to bear an interest of 5 per cent. per annum, payable, quarter yearly, at the Treasury, and redeemable at the pleasure of the United States, by payment of the principal, with a stipulation to pay the same at the expiration of thirty years. The Loan to be deemed to commence on the first of January, 1796, and to rest on funds permanently pledged, namely, the permanent revenue.

III. PROPOSITION.

That provision be made for converting, by a new Loan, the whole of our present Foreign, into

* These results are not stated with fractional correctness, because it is not necessary to a satisfactory conclusion, and the minuteness of the calculation would have demanded more than that can conveniently be spared.

Public Credit.

Domestic Debt, upon these terms, to wit: that, for any sum subscribed to the new Loan, and paid in the principal of the present Foreign Debt of the United States, there be allowed, in addition to the interest now payable upon such principal, the further yearly interest of $\frac{1}{2}$ per centum, or, in lieu thereof, at the option of each subscriber, an equivalent sum in capital stock, bearing an interest of 5 per centum per annum. That the whole interest upon the new Loan, including that upon the capital stock, to be given as an equivalent for the additional $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent, shall remain fixed until the first day of January, 1818, at which time, and not sooner, the principal of the said new Loan, including the said capital stock given as an equivalent, may and shall be reimbursed, except as to such subscribers as may prefer a shorter term of reimbursement, who may elect any term not less than fifteen years. That the permanent revenues shall be and remain firmly pledged for the payment of the said interest, until the reimbursement of the said principal, to be paid quarterly yearly, as that of the present funded Domestic Debt. And, lastly, that the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund be empowered, with the approbation of the President, to provide by new loans, for the reimbursement of any instalment, or part of principal, of the present Foreign Debt, or of the Loan to be made thereupon, as aforesaid, either by direct borrowing or by sale, in the market, of certificates of stock, so as the said Loan, or the said certificates of stock, shall bear an interest not exceeding 6 per centum per annum, and shall be liable to reimbursement within a term not exceeding twenty-four years. The interest upon the capital reimbursed, and, in aid thereof, the permanent revenues, to be pledged for the interest upon the loans or stock to be made or created by virtue of the said power.

IV. PROPOSITIONS.

That the temporary duties on imports be made co-extensive, in duration, with those now permanent, and be appropriated in like manner; and that the reservation of 600,000 dollars, annually, out of the duties on imports and tonnage, for the support of the Government of the United States, and their common defence, be postponed till after the appropriations for the interest of the Funded Debt, foreign and domestic, and for the Sinking Fund.

V. PROPOSITIONS.

That the following provisions be added to those heretofore made for reimbursing and redeeming the Debt of the United States:

1st. To direct, by law, that so much of the surplus of the duties on imports and tonnage, to the end of the year 1790, as shall remain uninvested in purchases, on the 1st day of January, 1798, shall so be invested, one-fourth part within the month of April, another fourth part within the month of July, another fourth part within the month of October, in that year, and the remainder within the month of January, 1797.

2d. To authorize the fund established by the act, entitled "An act supplementary to the act making provision for the Debt of the United States," redeemed by virtue of the foregoing provisions, (when the full redemption in each case is completed) until the whole of the present Debt of the United States, foreign and domestic, funded and unfunded, shall be redeemed, by reimbursement, purchase or otherwise.

6th. To provide for carrying to the same fund, agreeably to the appropriation in the Funding Act, the proceeds of the sales of the lands of the United States in the Western Territory, to be applied according to the said appropriation.

7th. To appropriate to the same fund, to be employed for the purposes thereof, all moneys which shall be received for debts due to the United States antecedent to the present Constitution.

8th. To provide that the surpluses of all the current revenues of the United States, which shall remain at the end of any calendar year, beyond the amount of the appropriations charged upon them, and which, during the session of Congress, commencing next thereafter, shall not be otherwise specially appropriated or reserved, shall be carried to the fund aforesaid, to be applied to the purposes thereof.

9th. To provide for paying, annually, out of the said fund, the sum which may be rightfully paid in each year, towards the redemption of the funded stock, which does or shall bear an interest of six per centum per annum, excluding that which shall stand to the credit of the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund, and that which shall stand to the credit of particular States, on account of the balances reported in their favor by the Commissioners for settling accounts between the United States and individual States, commencing the redemption of that bearing a present interest, on the first of January, 1796, and of that to bear interest after the year 1800, on the first of January, 1802, and pledging, in the firmest manner, the faith of the United States to the creditors thereof, that the said fund shall be inviolably applied to the purpose of redeeming the stock aforesaid, and afterwards, to the redemption of the whole of the present Debt of the United States, foreign and domestic, funded and unfunded, until the whole shall be fully redeemed and discharged, and to be vested in the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund, as property in trust for the creditors, until the redemption of the whole of the present Debt of the United States shall be completed.

Provided always, that, whenever the fund shall be more than sufficient for paying off, as they accrue, the remaining instalments of the said Loan had of the Bank of the United States, and for the complete and final redemption of the whole of the aforesaid stock, bearing and to bear an interest of six per cent according to the right reserved for that purpose, and also for the payment of the instalments of the present Foreign Debt, or of such new Loans as may be made thereupon, pursuant to the third proposition, and for the reimbursement, purchase, or redemption of the residue of the present Debt of the United States, within the term of thirty years, it shall be lawful for Congress, if at war with any foreign European Power, to apply so much of the excess as they may think fit, the said excess being certified by the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund, towards the expenses of such war; excepting always so much of the said excess as may be requisite to fulfil any contracts which shall have been entered into by the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund, pursuant to the powers vested in them; and provided, that no second appropriation of any such excess shall derogate from or purchase of the said residue of the Debt, within the said term of thirty years.

10th. To provide that all reimbursements of the capital of the Public Debt, foreign and domestic, and of the remaining instalments of the aforesaid Loan of the Bank of the United States, be made under the superintendence of the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund, empowering them, with the approbation of the President of the United States, as the instalments of principal become due, to borrow, if necessary, the sums requisite to pay those instalments. Provided, that the ultimate term for the reimbursement of any Loan they may make, shall not exceed twenty-four years; the interest thereof to be charged—first, upon the interest of the instalments which shall be reimbursed by means thereof, except the instalments of funded six per cent stock; secondly, upon the revenue from imports and tonnage, to make good any deficiency.

VI. PROPOSITIONS.

That power be given to the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund, with the approbation of the President, to borrow, from time to time, such sums as may be necessary in anticipation of the revenues appropriated for the purpose, not exceeding, in one year, one million of dollars, to be reimbursed within a year from the time of each Loan, for the payment of the interest which shall annually accrue on the Public Debt.

The interest upon each Loan to be defrayed out of the permanent revenues.

VII. PROPOSITIONS.

That the internal revenues from snuff and refined sugar, sales at auction, licenses to sell by retail foreign distilled spirits and wines, carriages for the conveyance of persons, be continued to the first day of January, 1800, and that the reimbursement of the principal of the Loan of $1,000,000, authorized to be borrowed for defraying the expenses of foreign intercourse, be charged upon this fund.

VIII. PROPOSITIONS.

That, in regard to any sum which shall have remained unexpended upon any appropriation other than for the payment of the interest of the Funded Debt and for the purposes of the Sinking Fund, for more than two years after the end of the calendar year in which the act of appropriation shall have been passed, such appropriation shall be deemed to cease and determine—and the sum expended upon it shall be carried to an account to be denominated "the Surplus Fund." But no appropriation shall be so deemed to have ceased or determined, till after the year 1796 unless it shall appear to the Secretary of the Treasury that the object of such appropriation has been fully satisfied; in which case it shall be lawful for him to cause to be carried the unexpended residue thereof to the account aforesaid.

IX. PROPOSITION.

That provision be made that all priorities, heretofore established in the appropriations for the Funded Debt, as between the different parts of the said Debt, shall, after the year 1796, cease, with respect to all creditors of the United States who do not before the expiration of the period, signify their dissent therefrom; and that, thenceforth, with the exception only of the debts of those creditors, who shall so signify their dissent, the revenues charged with these appropriations shall constitute a common or consolidated fund, chargeable indiscriminately and without priority.

X. PROPOSITION.

That provision be made for calling in all outstanding Loan Office certificates; certificates called final settlements, and indentures of interest, and for issuing, in lieu of them, other certificates of equivalent tenor, establishing that all which shall not be presented for exchange within the term of two years shall be barred.

Remarks upon the First Proposition.

The experiment has now been fully tried, and with nearly complete success, of the disposition of the public creditors to accept the terms offered by the Funding Act. Those who still decline have probably made a final election to abide by their original contracts.

It remains to fulfil them. This, the moral obligation of the contracts; the new and peremptory sanction given to them by the present Government, and the essential maxims of public credit, unite to demand; and, while these cogent motives, affecting intimately the permanent character and general interest of the United States, recommend the measure, there is now no longer any momentary inducement, from situation, to procrastinate.

The present advanced state of the national finances, and the inconsiderable magnitude of the still unsubscribed Debt, render it of little, if any, consequence to obtain upon it the temporary accommodation of deferring the payment of a part of the interest accruing according to contract. This motive apart, and considering the approximation of the period when the payment of interest on the Deferred Debt is to commence, the chance of benefiting by a fall of the market rate of interest, incident to a provision for the Debt on the terms of the contract, which make it redeemable at pleasure, may be found more advantageous to the Government than the partial postponement of interest encumbered with an abridgement of the right of redemption.

To those who should not rightly appreciate this circumstance, it might seem an objection that the provision proposed would place those creditors, who had not consented to accommodate the Government, upon a better footing than those who had so consented.

But a scruple of this kind is overruled by several considerations. 1st. It is not improbable that a considerable proportion of those who may not have accepted the terms offered by the Funding Act, are executors and other trustees, who may have doubted their power to accept.

2d. Giving the fullest force to the fact which is the ground of the objection, it is one of those cases in which the general principles that constitute the permanent happiness of society, give the less meritorious advantages over the more meritorious. All the creditors had a right to conform, or not. Those who have not done it, have only used their right, and it cannot be matter of objection or prejudice to them. To delay indefinitely a provision for their claims, according to contract, is to annihilate the contract.

The complying creditors cannot with propriety complain. They were informed unequivocally that the proposal of a new Loan was referred to their free choice; that the rights of those who did not assent would remain unimpaired; and compensations were offered in the new contracts for the surrender of the old. A plea that an ultimate provision was not relied upon, could not be admitted, because it would be to convert a distrust of the faith of the Government, into an argument against its being observed towards those who had depended upon it.

But the complying creditors actually received valuable considerations for the modification of their claims, instead of annual provision for their interest, which alone their contracts as they stood had it secured by adequate funds permanently mortgaged for its payment.

Instead of the stipulated annuity being redeemable at pleasure, whenever a fall in the market rate of interest should render it advantageous to pay off the principal, it has acquired a more fixed character by the relinquishment of the right of the Government to redeem, except in certain proportions, and a capacity to increase in capital value, by a declension of the market rate of interest.

Instead of receiving their interest in one payment, at the end of a year, they receive it in quarter yearly portions, which makes it, in fact, 6.15 per cent., in lieu of the stipulated rate of six per centum.

On the first point it has been argued, that, supposing a steady preservation of its faith by the Government, it is indifferent to the creditor whether his demand stands upon the basis of an annual provision, or upon that of mortgaged funds.

This is to substitute theory to fact. As well with regard to a Government as to an individual, there is, in the nature of things, an intrinsic difference between the value of a debt bottomed on mortgaged funds, and that of a debt resting on what is called, in the one case, and may be called in the other, personal security. The degree of this difference, and some of the circumstances on which it depends, may be different in the two cases, but the reality of its existence can be denied in neither.

Government being administered by men, is naturally, like individuals, subject to particular impulses, passions, prejudices, vices; of course to inconstancy of views and mutability of conduct.

A kind of property of which the essence is contract, must necessarily, therefore, be more or less valuable, because more or less secure, in proportion as it is little or much exposed to the influence of that inconstancy, or that mutability.

If a provision is to be made by a new resolution every year, that resolution being always liable to be affected by momentary circumstances, is always casual.

If made once for all, it continues, of course, unless revoked by some positive act, and has for that reason a moral certainty of stability.

But why, it might be asked, if a disposition unfavourable to the public engagements, or unfriendly to the public credit should exist, would it not operate to produce a violation of a provision made, as well as to prevent the making of one?

The two things are widely different. To undo, which is to act, and, in such a case, to act with violence, requires more enterprise and vigor, and presupposes greater energy, or a stronger impulse, than not to do, or to forbear to act. This is particularly true where a number of wills is to concur. Many men who will not rouse to the effort, or encounter the responsibility of doing mischief by positive acts, will readily enough slide into it by a negative conduct; that is, by omitting to act. Many men, merely from easiness of temper, or want of active fortitude, will suffer evil to take place, which they neither desire nor would themselves commit. In collective bodies, votes are necessary to action: absences may produce inaction. It often happens, that a majority of voices could not be had to a resolution to undo or reverse a thing once done, which there would not be a majority of voices to do.

This reasoning acquires tenfold force when applied to a complex Government like ours; that is, to a Government distributed into departments, acting through different organs which must concur to give it motion; as, in our Constitution, the House of Representatives, the Senate, and the President.

In delicate and difficult cases, whether to issue in good or ill, a suspension of action is far more natural to such a Government than action.

It can hardly happen that all the branches or parts of it can be infected at one time with a common passion, or disposition, manifestly inimical to justice and the public good, as to prostrate the public credit by revoking a pledge given to the creditors. It is far more probable that such a disposition should, at one time, possess one part, at another time, another part. Possessing either part, it might be sufficient to obstruct a provision which was to be made. Without possessing all the parts, it could not subvert one which had been made. The last can scarcely be supposed, except in one of those extraordinary crises of nations which confound all ordinary calculations.

Hence the value of property in Public Debt, which rests on specified and competent funds, firmly pledged for the satisfaction of the creditor, is intrinsically greater, and to a considerable extent, than that of property in Public Debt, which depends on annual provision. Hence, too, a creditor to whom such a pledge was not stipulated, may be justly said to have received a compensation for the relinquishment of a portion of his interest.

On the second point, it has been observed, with less plausibility, that, in this country, where it would be to the advantage of the creditor to receive his principal rather than a rate of six per cent. interest, the abridgment of the right of redemption is of no value.

1st. The proposition is not universally true. It depends on the particular situation of a creditor whether it be his interest to be reimbursed his principal or not. It is believed, owing to the impunctuality of collections, that in no part of the United States does fair lending at private interest, upon real security, net six per cent.

2d. As far as it is true, it does not authorize the inference which is drawn, because the creditor cannot demand his principal when it suits him, but must wait till it is convenient for the Government to pay. This convenience might not exist till there was a fall in the market rate of interest, and then it would not be the interest of the creditor to receive.

Unable to exact the principal when he pleases, it is a material point gained to be able to arrest the hand of the Government from paying him, when it is his interest not to receive. It is evident, that whenever the rate of interest to which he is entitled, shall exceed the market rate, if he cannot be obliged to receive back his principal, or take the market rate, his stock must rise in value in proportion to the difference and degree of its duration.

Nor, is an idea which has been entertained, just, that this advantage is remote and contingent, to accrue only to those who may be holders at the time of the fall of interest, at the expense of those who were holders when the Funding Act passed, many of whom, as it is alleged, being obliged to alienate then or shortly after, suffered loss in the sale, from the postponement of a part of their interest, without benefiting by the supposed equivalent.

The fairness of an equivalent ought never to be tested by the necessities of particular individuals. It ought to be estimated by the general principles of value; by the natural and real operation of things. Admitting, therefore, the suggestion as to such individuals to be true, it would decide nothing.

But it is not true. The permanency of a high rate of interest, and the possibility of a future rise of the capital above par, by the fall of the market rate below the stipulated rate, were, to the first holders of stock, circumstances of present value.

Public Credit.

Foreigners, especially, whose purchases would necessarily influence the market would give higher prices for it on these accounts.

And when to this are added the funding of the new stock and the payment of the interest quarter yearly, there is solid ground for entertaining an opinion that the stock has, from the earliest period, borne a better price in the market than upon the principle of an annual payment of six per cent. on the whole capital depending upon an annual provision.

This opinion would be confirmed, if we should take as a guide what actually happened in one or more of the States which made annual provision for the payment of interest upon their debts, at the stipulated rate of six per cent. With this provision the market price of their stock rarely exceeded 83 per centum.

It is probable that greater confidence in the ability and constancy of views of the Government of the United States, might have given a greater value to their stock in a like situation. But it is not to be doubted that it would have felt, in a great degree, a similar effect of that situation.

This may not appear with respect to the small amount of unsubscribed Debt now to be provided for, and with the advantage of a confirmation of confidence by experience; but it could not have failed to have been very apparent, if the whole Debt had been provided for on this plan.

These observations serve to render it probable that the creditors who have accepted the terms offered by the Government, have not been injured by the acceptance; that, if they had now an option to change their ground for that which is now proposed for non-subscribers, it would be an ill-judged choice in them to do it; and that, upon these, as well as other accounts, they will have no cause to be dissatisfied with the proposal under consideration.

Let it be added, that, whether the non-subscribers shall fare better or not by that proposal than the subscribers, it is the interest of all the public creditors, upon principle and precedent, that the public faith should be preserved towards those non-subscribers.

But, at the same time, every consideration connected with the question urges that nothing more should be done for non-subscribers than is positively due to good faith. Accordingly, the proposition contemplates that their debt shall not be funded, but that provision shall be annually made.

With regard to arrears of interest, a tenth part only is proposed to be paid on the first of January, 1796. At this rate they would be paid off in ten years.

In strictness, they ought to be immediately discharged. But, to have done this on the whole Debt, would have been impracticable; to do it on what now remains unsubscribed, would not only be unequal, but would, at the present moment, obstruct arrangements which are conducive to the general interests of the creditors. The state of the Treasury in succeeding years will enable Congress to decide how far the payment can be accelerated. In the mean time, the creditors have an option to separate these arrears from the principal, and to fund them at three per cent., as has been done generally with regard to interest. The case of a large arrear of interest, arising from the inability of a former Government, which is the present case, is liable to some peculiar considerations.

A difference is made in the special case of the Loan Office certificates, which, by contract, are entitled to interest of six per cent. on the nominal principal, redeemable only by payment of the specie principal.

This is too disadvantageous a footing for the Government.

The alternative most convenient at this time, is to pay off the Debt, which is proposed. To elude this contract would be to sacrifice a very great principle to a very little interest.

The amount will be seen in the statement A.

Remarks on the Second Proposition.

The certificates, or bills of credit, called new emission money, were emitted pursuant to a resolution of Congress, of the 18th of March, 1780, which directs them to be emitted upon the funds of individual States, to bear an interest of five per centum per annum, payable in specie, at the redemption of the bills; or, at the election of the holder, annually, at the Continental Loan Office, in sterling bills, drawn by the United States upon their Commissioners in Europe, and pledges the faith of the United States for the payment of the said bills, in case any State on whose funds they should be emitted, should, by the events of war, be rendered incapable to redeem them; directing, also, an endorsement to be made upon each bill, in these words: "The United States insure the payment of the within bill, and will draw bills of exchange for the interest annually, if demanded, according to a resolution of Congress of the 18th of March, 1780."

These resolutions and the endorsement upon the bills, engage the absolute promise of the United States for the payment of the interest indefinitely, and their eventual guarantee of the principal, in case any State on whose funds the bills should be emitted, should, by the events of war, be rendered incapable to redeem them; which is, in effect, though not in form, an absolute guarantee of the principal, for the United States are bound to pay the interest perpetually till that is discharged.

Good faith demands that the United States should supply the omissions of the States which issued the bills, by providing themselves, at least for the interest upon them.

But it is not as easy to pronounce on what terms they ought to be provided for.

On their face, and according to the unrevoked resolutions of Congress, they are of specie value, equal to their nominal amount, and bearing five per cent. interest.

But it is known that they were issued by different States, at different values, fixed by previous laws. The true nature of the contract, therefore, in fact, and the true equity of the case, are, from these circumstances, involved in some question.

Public Credit.

A compromise, by a new agreement, seems the best road out of the difficulty.

This is the aim of the proposition, which, it is hoped, will, in the main, reasonably consult all interests.

There have been special references of this subject to the Secretary, but he purposely declined a report till the expiration of the term limited by the act, entitled, "An act relative to claims against the United States, not barred by any act of limitation, and which have not been already adjusted," passed the 13th of February, 1793, had obviated a danger to which the business was exposed. It is now ascertained that the amount for which the United States shall be in future liable, is ninety thousand five hundred and seventy-four dollars. The sums subscribed to the Loan, will, of course, be a charge against the States which respectively issued the bills.

Remarks on the Third Proposition.

The payment of interest and instalments of principal of our Foreign Debt, in the countries where it was contracted, is found by experience to be attended with difficulty, embarrassment, some loss, and a degree of casualty which occasionally puts in jeopardy the national credit. Loans for reimbursement must be made before-hand, as the market suits, and necessarily involve double interest for a greater or less time. The procuring of bills to be remitted for payment of interest, cannot be depended upon in coincidence with the periods of payment, which, co-operating with distance, renders inconvenient anticipations necessary.

The remitting in commodities would be liable to other casualties, and to some peculiar objections; and whatever mode be adopted, it may be frequently not practicable to deposit in season the necessary funds on the spot, without great sacrifices. If, therefore, the place of these payments could, with consent of the creditors, upon an equitable indemnification to them for the transfer, be changed to the United States, the operation would be, in various lights, beneficial. It has occurred that the present posture of the affairs of Europe might favor a plan of this kind, and perhaps produce some collateral advantages. Under this idea, an experiment is proposed. The promised augmentation of interest is intended as an indemnification for the expense and hazard of agencies in this country, delays in remittance, inconvenience of distant negotiation, renunciation of the facilities which attend the receipt of interest at home, risks of loss by exchange, &c., and is calculated on a liberal scale, in order to induce an acceptance of the proposition.

If, instead of an increase of interest, the option of an equivalent be given, by way of premium, in stock bearing an interest of five per cent., it would have attractions for certain creditors, and would facilitate the success of the measure. On strict calculation, the equivalent would be six dollars and fifty-eight cents per 100 dollars of the principal subscribed. It is not perceived that the interests of the United States could suffer by allowing the alternative. The fixing of the rate of interest, by postponing the reimbursement to the year 1818, would also be a powerful inducement. And till the period of reimbursement arrives, any surplus of the Sinking Fund which may exist, can be invested in purchases, so as to prevent the progress of the fund being arrested.

It could not be necessary to observe, except for the sake of dispelling jealousy or apprehension on the part of the creditors, that, while the plan is in experiment, and afterwards, with regard to all who do not embrace it, everything is to proceed as heretofore, and as the contracts respecting the debt require.

The auxiliary proposition of giving power to the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund to remit certificates for sale, is founded upon a belief that this operation will sometimes be practicable, where direct loans cannot be effected, and will be occasionally a more beneficial mode of remittance than by bills of exchange.

Remark on the Fourth Proposition.

The object of this proposition is to give moral certainty to the adequateness of the fund for paying the interest upon the Debt, and for its ultimate redemption, making a reasonable allowance for the casualties to which it is exposed.

Remarks on the Fifth Proposition.

There is no sentiment which can better deserve the serious attention of the legislators of a country, than the one expressed in the Speech of the President, which indicates the danger to every Government from the progressive accumulation of debt.

A tendency to it is, perhaps, the natural disease of all Governments; and it is not easy to conceive anything more likely than this to lead to great and convulsive revolutions of empire.

On the one hand, the exigencies of a nation, creating new causes of expenditure, as well from its own, as from the ambition, rapacity, injustice, intemperance, and folly, of other nations, proceed in increasing and rapid succession. On the other, there is a general propensity in those who administer the affairs of a Government, founded in the constitution of man, to shift off the burden from the present to a future day—a propensity which may be expected to be strong in proportion as the form of a State is popular.

To extinguish a debt which exists, and to avoid the contracting more, are ideas always favored by public feeling and opinion; but to pay taxes for the one or the other purpose, which are the only means of avoiding the evil, is always more or less unpopular. These contradictions are in human nature; and happy, indeed, would be the lot of a country that should ever want men ready to turn them to the account of their own popularity, or to some other sinister account.

Hence, it is no uncommon spectacle to see the same men clamoring for occasions of expense, when they happen to be in union with the present humor of the community, whether well or ill directed, declaiming against a Public Debt, and for the reduction of it as an abstract thesis; yet vehement against every plan of taxation which is proposed to discharge old debts, or to avoid new, by defraying expenses of exigencies as they emerge.

These unbandsome arts throw artificial embarrassment in the way of the administration of a Government, and, co-operating with the desire which they themselves are too apt to feel to conciliate public favor, by declining to lay even necessary burdens, or with the fear of losing it, by imposing them with firmness, serve to promote the accumulation of Debt, by leaving that which exists without adequate provision for its reimbursement, and by preventing the levying, with energy, new taxes, when new occasions of expense occur. The consequence is, that the Public Debt swells till its magnitude becomes enormous, and the burdens of the people gradually increase, till their weight becomes intolerable. Of such a state of things, great disorders in the whole political economy, convulsions and revolutions of Government, are a natural offspring.

There can be no more sacred obligation, then, on the public agents of a nation, than to guard, with provident foresight and inflexible perseverance against so mischievous a result. True patriotism and genuine policy cannot, it is respectfully presumed, be better demonstrated by those of the United States, at the present juncture, than by improving, efficaciously, the very favorable situation in which they stand, for extinguishing with reasonable celerity, the actual Debt of the country, and for laying the foundation of a system which may shield posterity from the consequences of the usual improvidence and selfishness of its ancestors, and which, if possible, may give immortality to public credit.

Fortunately for the first object, the circumstances in our foreign affairs, which during the last session, impelled to an extension of the national revenues, have left little more to do than to apply the existing means with decision and efficacy.

The second object will depend on the establishment of wise principles in the application, fitted to become a permanent precedent in the fiscal system of the country.

The first report of the Secretary on the subject of the Public Debt, of the 9th of January, 1790, suggests the idea of "incorporating, as a fundamental maxim in the system of public credit of the United States, that the creation of Debt should always be accompanied with the means of extinguishment; that this is the true secret for rendering public credit immortal, and that it is difficult to conceive a situation in which there may not be an adherence to the maxim;" and it expresses "an unfeigned solicitude, that this may be attempted by the United States, and that they may commence their measures for the establishment of credit with the observance of it."

It is understood that the Parliament of Great Britain has within the last four years, formally adopted as a standing rule, the principle of incorporating, with the creation of Debt, the means of extinguishment. How much earlier in the creation of this important principle be to the United States, than the creation of a nation which, before it began, had so deeply mortgaged its resources. Let the United States never have to regret, hereafter, that they postponed too long so provident a precaution.

No opportunity has been lost by the Secretary as far as he could contribute to the event, to reduce this principle to practice; and important steps towards it have been, from time to time, taken by the Legislature.

But much remains to be done to give it full effect. The present state of things encourages and invites to the consummation of the plan. And the Secretary, about to leave the office he holds, feels it a peculiar duty to make a final effort to promote that invaluable end.

This is the object of the fifth proposition, aided by the preliminary provisions of the 4th. This proposition aims at two principal points: 1. To constitute a fund sufficient, in every supposable event, for extinguishing the whole of the present Debt of the United States, foreign and domestic, in a period not exceeding thirty years. 2. To fix its destination unchangeably, by not only appropriating it permanently, under the direction of Commissioners, and vesting it in them as property in trust, but by making its faithful application a part of the contract with the creditors.

As to the first point: If the temporary duties on imports be rendered permanent, the annual reservation of six millions of dollars postponed; and if the additional appropriations which are proposed, be made to the Sinking Fund; its intended force will not only be equal to the effect meant to be produced, but it may be hoped that there is scarcely a casualty which can reasonably be taken into calculation, foreign war not excepted, which will occasion a deficiency in the fund.

The whole amount of the duties on imports and tonnage, and upon domestic distilled spirits and stills, estimated now to amount to $6,079,418 58, besides the dividends on Bank stock, and the items which now compose the Sinking Fund, will then be appropriated, primarily, to the interest upon the Public Debt, and to the Sinking Fund; which, together, including the deferred stock, will demand, permanently, from that revenue, $4,373,836 03—little more than two-thirds of the funds from which they arise. An expectation may be indulged, that even foreign war, making due allowance for what will always be practicable, through neutral Powers, would not occasion a defalcation in the revenues greater than the difference. This competency of the fund is an essential idea. The fulfilment of the object, as far as the uncertainty of human affairs will permit, ought to be superior to casualty.

The necessity of a reliance on auxiliary provisions, always precarious in those situations which affect the productiveness of the public revenues, ought to be, as far as practicable, superseded by the ample nature of the provision.

As to the second point: The intent is to secure, by all the sanctions of which the subject is susceptible, an inviolate application of the fund, according to its destination. No expedients more powerful can be devised for this purpose, than to clothe it with the character of private property, and to engage absolutely the faith of the Government, by making the application of it to the object, a part of the contract with the creditors.

But is this necessary?

Its necessity rests on these cogent reasons: The inviolable application of an adequate Sinking Fund is the only practicable security against an excessive accumulation of Debt, and the essential basis of a permanent national credit.

Experience has shown, in countries the most attentive to the principles of credit, that a simple appropriation of the Sinking Fund is not a complete barrier against its being diverted, when immediate exigencies press. The causes which have been stated with another view, tempt the administrators of Government to lay hold of this resource rather than resort to new taxes. This indicates the utility of endeavoring to give, by additional sanctions, inviolability to the fund.

But, will those proposed answer the end?

They are the most efficacious that can be imagined, and they are likely to be entirely efficacious. They cannot be disregarded, without, by breach of faith and contract, destroying credit; and, at a juncture, too, when it is most indispensable. The emergencies, which induce a diversion of the fund, are those in which loans, and, consequently, credit, are most needed.

But will it be safe to put the fund so entirely out of the command of the Government? May there not be situations in which the command of it may be requisite to the safety of the State?

This is not conceivable. The amount of the Sinking Fund will, in the situations which create extraordinary demands for money, be always considerable, compared even with a single year's expenditure. The current revenues of a nation do not, in such cases, suffice. Plunder or credit must supply the deficiency. The first presupposes a subversion of all social order. The second will find its best support and greatest efficacy in adhering steadily to the principles of such a fund. An annuity of seven dollars will pay the interest upon, and discharge a capital of one hundred dollars, bearing six per cent. interest, in thirty-three and a third years, nearly. The situation of a country must be not a little exhausted, if it cannot create yearly, by new revenues, during the continuance of a foreign war, an annuity on the above scale, sufficient to fund the loans, of which it may stand in need. Ten millions of dollars will, with order and economy, maintain, in this country, an army of fifty thousand men, for a year. Viewing our geographical position, is there a prospect of any war expensive beyond this ratio? If not, an annuity of seven hundred thousand dollars, created each year of the war, would suffice. But it would be wise, in such an event, to carry taxation, in the first instance, to the full extent of the ability of the State, which would proportionably contract the necessity for borrowing, and consequently, the extent of the annuities necessary for loans.

If a nation can find embarrassment in creating the revenues requisite on this scale, it must arise from her having reached a stage when, from the neglect of the principle now inculcated, the mass of her Debt has become so enormous as to strain her faculties in order to make a provision for it.

The United States are in a situation altogether different. An inspection of the list of their revenues discovers that they have a large field of resource unexplored. Their youth, and large tracts of unsettled lands, and lands in the infancy of improvement, assure them a great and rapid increase of means. Even their actual revenues, without additions, must, with the progress of the country, considerably increase. And, though war may interrupt, the temporary interruption being removed by the restoration of peace, their increasing productiveness, suspended for a time, must resume its vigor and growth. In a given number of years, a considerable augmentation is certain.

The Government of this country may, therefore, adopt, fearless of future embarrassment, a principle which, being adopted, will ultimately furnish resources for future exigencies, without an increase of burden to the community.

To explain this last idea: It will readily be perceived, that the funds pledged for paying the interest, and sinking the principal of a portion of the Debt existing or created at a particular time, will, within a certain period, extinguish that portion of Debt.

They will then be liberated, and will be ready for any future use, either to defray current expenditures, or be the basis of new loans, as circumstances may dictate. And, after a course of time, it is a reasonable presumption, that the funds, so successively liberated, will be adequate to new exigencies, as they occur.

Moreover, the last clause of the proposition authorizes the deriving aid from the Sinking Fund for new loans, whenever the state of the fund admits of it, consistently with the accomplishment of its purposes; that is, when it is sufficient—1st, to make good the payments on account of the principal of the Debt, as they accrue; 2d, to purchase in the market all that part of the Public Debts of which there is no stipulation of payment by installment, (as the three per cent. stock) within a period of thirty years.

This, while it secures the extinction of the existing Debt, within a reasonable time, by preventing too great a proportion of the public revenue from being tied up by the Sinking Fund, gives due weight to the consideration of providing for future emergencies.

The same consideration has governed in proposing, (instead of the appropriation of a definite sum out of the revenue from imports and tonnage which, in certain years, will be greater than will be permanently necessary) that the sum to be applied out of that revenue shall be so much, from year to year, as, with the other items of the Sinking Fund, will suffice for the object. It has likewise influenced in postponing the redemption of that stock which stands to the credit of certain States, in consequence of the report of the Commissioners for settlement of accounts.

Every system of public credit must assume it as a fundamental principle, that the resources of the country are equal to its probable exigencies, and that it will possess ability to pay the debts which it contracts. If this be so, there is no cause to hesitate about the inviolable appropriation of funds to the extinction of an existing Debt, within no less a term than thirty years.

Indeed, as before intimated, it cannot be doubted that the resources of a credit, built upon a foundation so solid as that which is recommended, will more than replace, even in the earliest stages of our affairs, the use of the additional funds withdrawn from the command of the Government, to effect it, and, in the eventual operation will give a more abundant command of funds, than it can otherwise have. The successive liberation of the revenues, successively pledged, after accomplishing their object, will afford resources that may almost be said to be inexhaustible.

It should be recollected, too, that the public arrangements may, under a great pressure, anticipate the approaching period of such a liberation, by intermediate temporary loans, to be replaced by those funds when they are free.

This proposition exemplifies, as to the past, the nature of the maxim which has been supposed capable of giving immortality to credit, namely, that, with the creation of debt, should be incorporated the means of extinguishment; which means are two-fold: 1. The establishing, at the time of contracting a debt, funds for the reimbursement of the principal, as well as for the payment of interest within a determinate period. 2. The making it a part of the contract, that the fund, so established, shall be invariably applied to the object.

It is believed that it would be happy for the United States, if Congress would adopt this principle as a rule in all future loans, never to be departed from; and a good evidence of this determination would be, to apply it to the past.

This would be, at the same time, an antidote against what may be pronounced the most plausible objections to the system of funding public debts; which are, that, by facilitating the means of supporting expense, they encourage to enterprising which produce it; and, by furnishing in credit a substitute for revenue, likely to be too freely used, to avoid the odium of laying new taxes, they occasion a tendency to run in debt. Though these objections to Funding Systems, which, giving the greatest possible energy to public credit, are a great source of national security, strength, and prosperity, are very similar to those which speculative men urge against national and individual opulence, drawn from its abuses; and though, perhaps, upon a careful analysis of facts, they would be found to have much less support in them than is imagined, attributing to those systems effects which are to be ascribed, more truly, to the passions of men, and perhaps to the genius of particular Governments; yet, as they are not wholly unfounded, it is desirable to guard, as far as possible, against the dangers which they suppose, without renouncing the advantages which these systems undoubtedly afford.

It will readily be seen, that the maxim of making concurrent provision for the principal as well as interest, in the act of contracting debt, if by precedent and habit, it can be rendered a rule of administration, by implicating a greater portion of the revenue in every such operation than would be requisite for a mere provision for interest, will control proportionably the disposition to defer the burden to futurity, and create a greater necessity for circumspection in incurring expense.

It is, probably, the true expedient for uniting a due regard to the present accommodation of the community, with a due care not to overburden posterity—the full energy of public credit, with a salutary restraint upon the abuses of it.

To this explanation of the general principles of the fifth proposition, it may be proper to add some brief notes on particular parts of it.

It is proposed that the redemption of the present six per cent. stock shall commence on the 1st of January, 1796. This time of commencement is recommended by several reasons: 1. It ought to be such as to admit of sufficient notice to distant creditors. 2. It will favor order, to date the commencement of every new pecuniary operation, where there is an option, and no particular reason to the contrary, with the commencement of the natural year. 3. The moment of payment presupposes that the annuity to be paid has actually accrued, which will not be the case till the end of the present year. 4. The small delay, by not forcing the means, will facilitate the future execution.

It is a part of the plan to make provision for reimbursing the remaining instalments of the two million Loan, had of the Bank of the United States, pursuant to the act of incorporation. The preceding instalments have been reimbursed out of the proceeds of Foreign Loans. This resource cannot, in future, be relied upon; and, for such a purpose, it is not as eligible as a domestic one, though circumstances have hitherto dictated a recurrence to it. By making the dividends on the stock auxiliary for this purpose to the revenue from taxes, the object is effected with little more than half the sum from that revenue; and, in the end, a fund is formed from the dividends, which, with a small addition, suffices for the redemption of the deferred stock. As these instalments are yearly falling due, and must be, as they accrue, it is essential that a provision for them be contemplated in the general arrangement requisite to the completion of our system of credit. There is, perhaps, no easy alternative to what is proposed, except the sale of the stock. But, waiving other weighty considerations against such a measure, it is, in the view of a true economy, liable to the most solid objections.

It is morally certain, that the dividends on the stock will increase, and the value of the capital, from this and collateral causes, more than proportionably. There is no momentary urgency to induce the relinquishment of this future advantage. To sell at present, would be to abandon the difference without necessity. It cannot be expedient in a Government to part with a capital, which, at the time, produces as great or a greater revenue, than can be realized from the proceeds of a sale, however invested; and which has an inherent tendency to future augmentation. The measure, too, would be to renounce, or lessen, a most convenient resource for forming the redeeming fund of the deferred stock.

It is proposed to carry the proceeds of the sales of the Western lands to the Sinking Fund. This is to execute the intention of the Funding Act, which has not organized the mode of application; and it has the advantage of combining, in one system, all the provisions for extinguishing the Debt.

It is proposed that all surpluses of revenue shall, at a certain time, be carried to the use of the Sinking Fund. This is to extend and give effect to a principle which has already received the Legislative sanction. It was necessary to fix a time when the appropriation of the surplus should become absolute, and that this should be consistent with a due opportunity to provide for the exigencies of the public service. Both these considerations have been consulted. This measure has, besides, reference to a more speedy redemption of the Debt than it appears prudent to attempt by an absolute appropriation of more extensive funds. And the legislators of to-day would be entitled to the lasting gratitude of their country, if they would extend this auxiliary resource, by all the means which are consistent with a due regard to the present accommodation of their constituents.

It is proposed to authorize the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund to provide, by new loans, for the reimbursement of the instalments which, from time to time, accrue. This is on the ground, that it is essential to the perfection of the system of redemption, that all the means of ultimate execution should be organized in it, and that there should be no need of future provisions.

The last clause of the proposition excepts, from the operation of that clause, the interest on the six per cent. stock. This is because that interest is destined to form the accumulations for paying the successive instalments of the principal of that stock, which increase each year in a ratio to the interest liberated by each payment.

The statement E exhibits the course of the Sinking Fund, as proposed to be established.

Remarks on the Sixth Proposition.

This will be a useful and important provision. It has reference to a circumstance repeatedly adverted to—the long credits given upon the principal branches of revenue; from which it happens, that, though the fund itself, or the product of the revenue, is more than adequate to an appropriation, yet the receipts upon it come too slowly into the Treasury to answer the end, without anticipation by temporary loans. Its propriety depends on the principle suggested under the last head, of having all the means of complete execution organized in the system of Public Credit.

Remarks on the Seventh Proposition.

It is a good rule of caution, that no more of the public revenues should be rendered permanent, than is necessary to give moral certainty to the provisions which may be regarded as the pillars of Public Credit. This idea will, it is believed, be satisfied, by giving permanency to the now temporary duties on imports. Accordingly, it is only proposed to extend the duties, mentioned in this proposition, to the year 1800, and thence, to the end of the next ensuing session of Congress; which is on the ground, that they ought to be commensurate in duration with the objects which they are to accomplish, and no more.

It has been already noticed, that they are at present chargeable, together with the temporary duties on imports, laid in the last session, with an appropriation of 1,292,137 dollars and thirty-eight cents, and with the interest of one million of dollars, authorized to be borrowed with a view to foreign intercourse; having a special eye to an object very interesting to the commerce and feelings of the United States.

This business wants a further arrangement; standing at present, upon a vague and inefficient footing. The reimbursement of the Loan is not adequately provided for, neither is the interest, this being predicated on funds which, in their present form, would probably expire after a product of two years.

According to the fifth proposition, the temporary duties on imports, after the above mentioned appropriation of 1,292,137 dollars and thirty-eight cents shall have been satisfied, will become permanently charged with the interest on the Public Debt, the Sinking Fund, and the annual reservation of six hundred thousand dollars for the support of Government.

If the duties mentioned in the sixth proposition are continued till the first of January, 1800, and the reimbursement of the principal of the Loan, as well as the interest, is referred to them, two good purposes will be answered: the obtaining the Loan will be facilitated, and its complete reimbursement will be effected within the term allotted, without an augmentation of the permanent Debt of the country. This makes allowance for fulfilling the appropriation for the current service, already charged upon this fund.

It is presumed to be a conclusive reason in favor of the proposition, that it aims at preventing an increase of permanent Debt. If services of this kind, when the United States are at peace, (at least with civilized Powers) are made causes of permanent loans, the progress of new debt will easily exceed the extinction of old.

It appears desirable that there should be a steady effort, as a rule of administration, not to increase the permanent Debt of the country by permanent loans, except when it is inevitable, by the existence of a war with some European Power.

The comparative view of revenue and expenditure (statement F) establishes, satisfactorily, that these duties cannot be dispensed with, unless there be a substitute, if the redemption of the Public Debt is to be seriously entered upon; and it is believed that there cannot be devised objects of revenue more proper in themselves, nor more generally acceptable to the people. Whatever interested parties may allege, it seems self-evident that there can hardly be a reasonable question, except as to the best mode of collection. The objection, that part of them falls on manufactures, has no weight. The manufactures on which they fall are complete luxuries, and completely established; consequently, fit objects of revenue. The increased duties on the rival foreign articles, are a full protection to the manufacture. Whatever may be the appearances in the infancy of the tax, it is certain, in principle, that it will finally fall on the consumer, as generally as duties on imported commodities.

Remarks on the Eighth Proposition.

This is to terminate an embarrassment which has been experienced. Appropriations are frequently made for objects, the extent of which is not precisely known, or in a degree casual. To leave them indefinite, as to time, is sometimes to tie up, unnecessarily, a portion of the public funds, which may, ultimately, not be wanted at all for the purpose of the original appropriation.

It will do away this inconvenience, and promote perspicuity in the Treasury accounts of appropriations, if an ultimate period is fixed when each appropriation shall be deemed to have ceased. Should further appropriations appear necessary for the same objects, new estimates can be presented, and new appropriations made.

The designating an account with a denomination known in the laws, to which the surplusses are to be carried, will facilitate future Legislative dispositions of the resulting fund. It is, however, essential to the system of Public Credit, that this should be with the exceptions contained in the proposition.

Remarks on the Ninth Proposition.

This proposition is calculated to give simplicity to the public accounts of stock and revenue, which will conduce to correctness, despatch, and economy. As the revenues are manifestly more than adequate to the claims of all the creditors, they, none of them, have any interest in the distinctions which now exist, and which grew out of the course of the business, and the rights of none of them will be affected, because all who choose may continue on their former ground, by signifying their dissent to the present plan. It is, however, presumed, there will be no such dissent.

Remarks on the Tenth Proposition.

It is important to the fiscal calculations, to ascertain, positively, the extent of every portion of the Public Debt. At present, the amount of these several items of it is deducted from accounts of the late war, of various officers and offices; in some instances, conducted with little order. There is not, therefore, sufficient certainty; indeed, it is probable, from the length of time that has elapsed without their appearing, that the computed amount exceeds the real.

Besides, they are, from their nature, subject to forgeries and counterfeitings; which implies a danger of loss to the public, till their circulation is finally terminated. The proposition, accordingly, besides the obtaining of better information, aims at obviating this danger.

Allowing for sufficient time for bringing them in to be exchanged for certificates of equivalent tenor, while it is a measure tending to public information and security, it can be liable to no reasonable objection on the part of the creditors.

The Secretary of the Treasury has reserved for the conclusion of this report, a proposition which appears to him of great importance to the Public Credit, and which, after some preliminary observations, will be offered to consideration. It relates to the right of taxing the Public Funds, and to that of sequestering them in time of war.

A proposition on either of those points, would have been deemed superfluous, had there never been discussions asserting a right to do the one and the other, and even the expediency of exercising that right. The negative of both the pretensions, from the habit of regarding it as incapable of being disputed, had acquired, in the mind of the Secretary, so much the force of an axiom, as to have precluded even the mention of the subject in the plan which he originally submitted for funding the Public Debt. He should, otherwise, have thought it an indispensable duty to suggest, as a matter of primary consequence to the system of credit contemplated in the plan, the express renunciation of those pretensions; for they are (as he believes) not only unwarranted by principle or usage, but subversive of the sound maxims of Public Credit. A persuasion that this would always be a truth granted in the councils of the United States, is his apology for the omission.

Even now he should think it useless to depart from his silence on the point, had not the discussions alluded to, created some alarm in places where all the circumstances are not well understood, which it is the interest of the country to dispel. The confidence justly to be reposed in the collective wisdom of this Government, forbids the supposition, by one acquainted with its Constitution, that the security of the creditor can need, in this particular, a further sanction. It is presumed to be impossible, that any final act can ever give so deep a wound to the national interest and character, as to derogate from a principle which may be placed among the most sacred in the administration of a Government.

Is there a right in the Government to tax its own funds?

The pretence of this right is deducted from the general right of the Legislative power to make all the property of the State contributory to its exigencies.

But this right is obviously liable to be restricted by the engagements of the Government; it cannot be justly exercised in contravention of them; they must form an exception. It will not be denied, that the general right in question, could, and would, be abridged, by an express promise not to tax the funds. This promise, indeed, has not been given in terms, but it has been given in substance. When an individual lends money to the State, the State stipulates to repay him the principal lent, with a certain interest, or to pay a certain interest, indefinitely, till the principal is reimbursed; or, it stipulates something equivalent, in another form. In our case, the stipulation is in the second form.

To tax the funds, is manifestly either to take, or to keep back, a portion of the principal or interest stipulated to be paid.

To do this, on whatever pretext, is not to do what is expressly promised; it is not to pay that precise principal, or that precise interest, which has been engaged to be paid; it is, therefore, to violate the promise given to the lender.

But, is not the stipulation to the lender, with a tacit reservation of the general right of the Legislature to raise contributions on the property of the State?

This cannot be supposed—because it involves two contradictory things: an obligation to do, and a right not to do. An obligation to pay a certain sum, and a right to retain it in the shape of a tax. It is against the rules, both of law and reason, to admit, by implication, in the construction of a contract, a principle which goes in destruction of it.

The Government, by such a construction, would be made to say to the lender: "I want a sum of money, for a national purpose, which all the citizens ought to contribute proportionably, but it will be more convenient to them, and to me, to borrow the money of you. If you will lend it, I promise you faithfully, to allow you a certain rate of interest, while I keep the money, and to reimburse the principal within a determinate period, except so much of the one and the other, as I may think fit to withhold, in the shape of a tax."

Is such a construction either natural or rational? Does it not, in fact, nullify the promise by the reservation of a right not to perform it?

Is it to be presumed, without being expressed, that such can be the understanding of a lender, when he parts with his money to a Government?

The contrary is so much the more presumable, that nothing short of an express reservation can support the pretension to tax the fund.

It may be replied, that the creditor might be willing to rely upon the equity of the Government, not to abuse its right, by exacting from him excessive contributions.

This, if true, does not obviate the difficulty of supposing the co-existence of an obligation and a right, destructive the one of the other, in interpreting the sense of a contract, when nothing of the kind is said.

It is possible that a creditor might be willing so to contract; yet it is still necessary, in order to determine that he has done it, to find some provisions or expressions in the contract, indicating the intention, to render what is stipulated compatible with what is reserved. But it is not probable that an individual would be willing to lend upon such terms. He would justly apprehend, that, in great emergencies, a right, having no limit but the opinion of the party possessed of the power, would be abused, and that the convenience of laying hold of a fund already prepared and at hand, supported by a claim of right, would be a temptation to abuse, not easy to be resisted. However well disposed to contribute, in common with his fellow-citizens, on all the ordinary objects of property or income, he would be unwilling to subject himself to a special burden, in the peculiar character of creditor of the State. He would prefer to employ his money in other ways: even to lend it to private persons, where it might be more likely to escape the hand of the fiscal power.

Let the question be tried by another analysis.

Public Debt can scarcely, in legal phrase, be defined either property in possession or in action. It is evidently not the first, till it is reduced to possession by payment. To be the second, would suppose a legal power to compel payment by suit. Does such a power exist? The true definition of Public Debt is a property subsisting in the faith of the Government. Its essence is promise. Its definite value depends upon the reliance that the promise will be definitely fulfilled. Can the Government rightfully tax its promises? Can it put its faith under contribution? Where or what is the value of the Debt if such a right exist?

Suppose the Government to contract with an individual to convey to him a hundred acres of land, upon the condition of paying a hundred dollars. When he came to pay the hundred dollars and demand his title, could the Government require of him to pay fifty more as a tax upon the land, before it would consent to give him the title? Who would not pronounce this to be a breach of contract—a fraud—which nothing could disguise?

This case is parallel with that under examination, with circumstances that fortify the right of the lending creditor.

The Government agrees with him, that, for one hundred dollars, which he delivers to the Government, it will deliver to him, at the end of each year, six dollars. Here the six dollars to be delivered answer to the land to be conveyed, with this stronger ground of right, that the consideration for them has actually been given and received. Yet, when the creditor comes to demand his six dollars, he is told that he cannot have them, except with the reservation of one dollar as a tax upon the six, or that he cannot have them, except upon the condition of returning one dollar as that tax. What is this but to say, that his title to the money in this case, as to the land in the other, must depend upon his paying, or allowing a further consideration for it, not contemplated in the contract? Can there be a doubt that this, also, would be a breach of contract—a fraud?

The true rule of every case of property, founded on contract with the Government, is this: It must first be reduced into possession, and then it will become subject, in common with other similar property, to the right of the Government to raise contributions upon it. It may be said, that the Government may fulfil this principle, by paying the interest with one hand, and taking back the amount of the tax with the other. But to this, the answer is, that, to comply truly with the rule, the tax must be upon all the money of the community, not upon the particular portion of it which is paid to the public creditors; and it ought, besides, to be so regulated, as not to include a lien of the tax upon the fund. The creditor should be no otherwise acted upon, than as every other possessor of money; and consequently, the money he receives from the public, can then only be a fit subject of taxation when it is entirely separated, and thrown, undistinguished, into the common mass. A different practice would amount to an evasion of the principle contemplated for, and to oppression. A rent, or annuity, liable before it passes, or in the act of passing, or at the moment of passing from one proprietor to another, to a deduction, or drawback, at the pleasure of the party from whom it is to pass, is an imaginary thing, destitute both of shape and substance. When a Government enters into contract with an individual, it deposes as to the matter of the contract, its Constitutional authority, and exchanges the character of legislator for that of a moral agent, with the same rights and obligations as an individual. Its promises may be justly considered as excepted out of its power to legislate, unless in aid of them. It is, in theory, impossible to reconcile the two ideas of a promise which obliges with a power to make a law which can vary the effect of it. This is the great principle that governs the question, and abridges the general right of the Government to lay taxes, excepting out of it a species of property which subsists only in its promise.

There are persons who, admitting the general rule, conceive a distinction to exist between a tax upon the funds, which must be paid at all events, and a tax upon alienations of them, which will only be paid when they are transferred from one to another. The latter they think justifiable, because it is in the option of the creditor to avoid the tax, by avoiding the alienation. But the difference between the two cases is only a difference in the degree of violation.

The stock, in its creation, is made transferable. This quality constitutes a material part of its value, and the existence of it is a part of the contract itself, to the Government, which has undertaken, itself, to conduct the operation of transferring by its own officers, and consequently at its own expense. It is as completely a breach of contract to derogate from this quality, in diminution of the value of stock, by encumbering the transfer with a charge or tax, as it is to take back, in the same shape, a portion of the principal or interest. It is obvious, too, that this may be carried so far as essentially to destroy the transferable capacity. But what is a tax upon transfers, other than the faculty of taking away from the actual proprietor of stock a portion of his principal, whenever his interests or his necessities demand a transfer, in derogation from the full enjoyment of the right to transfer, and from the express promise of the Government to pay to him or his alienee? For it is upon the seller, not upon the buyer, that such a tax will fall. And where is the substantial difference, on the ground of contract, between this and a direct tax upon the fund itself? The value of it is as certainly impaired by the one as by the other.

But shall the proprietor of money in the funds, then, be exempt from his proportion of the burdens which other citizens bear?

This will not be the consequence of the principle. As a consumer, of which his income is the instrument, he will pay his proportion of the taxes on consumption. As a holder of any other species of property procured by that income, or otherwise, which is liable to a tax, he must also contribute his proportion.

But, without undue refinement, the lender of money to the public may be affirmed to have paid his tax when he lends his money. Relying upon the engagement of the Government, express or implied, that he will receive what is promised him, without defalcation, he is content with a less interest than he would take if subject to any such defalcation, and especially if it was to be arbitrary as to its extent. In this lower rate of interest he may be truly said to pay his tax or to purchase an exemption from it.

Here, also, we find what is decisive on the point of expediency.

If the Government had a right to tax its funds, the exercise of that right would cost much more than it was worth. The money-lender would exact exorbitant premiums, not only as an indemnification for the use which the Government might probably make of its right, and which, in practice, would be likely to be qualified by some regard to equality of contribution, but as an equivalent for insurance against the risk or possibility of a more extensive use. Hence the Government would be likely to pay much more in premiums upon its Loans, than it would draw back in taxes; and the former being supposed but equal to the latter, there would be no advantage in exercising the right.

But it will be, perhaps, more safe to affirm, that there would be no borrowing at all upon such terms. The first precedent of a tax upon the funds might be expected to compel the Government to an express renunciation of the right in every future Loan. Solid capitalists would not be much inclined to adventure their money upon so precarious a footing as is implied in a power of taxing their credits.

These reflections lead readily to an estimate of the impressions which would be produced by the example of an imposition on the funds. Regarded either as a positive breach of contract, or as a deviation from the sound maxims of credit, the effect upon it would be nearly equally fatal. What ever might be excused to a time of revolution, to a defect of means, or to some extraordinary peculiarity of situation, no excuse would be admitted for a deliberate departure from principles, at a time, too, of national prosperity, in a flourishing state of the finances, after the foundations of a regular system had been laid. The departure would argue an incorrectness, an instability, or a depravity of views, calculated to give a lasting shock to Public Credit.

The United States must, henceforth, tread with the most cautious steps.

A renunciation of the right, in future, might not speedily heal the wound which an example of its exercise had given. Durable suspicion might fasten on the wisdom or the integrity of the Government, which might occasion to it no inconsiderable loss and embarrassment, before a course of contrary experience would obliterate them.

The right of a Government to sequester or confiscate property, in its funds, in time of war, involves considerations analogous to those which regard the right of taxing them. Whether the foreigner be, himself, the original lender, or the proprietor of stock, in its constitution transferable without discrimination, he stands upon equal ground with the citizen. He has an equal claim upon the faith of the Government.

In the second case, as the substitute of the original lender, the promise made attaches immediately upon him. Indeed, the certificates which issue upon every transfer, and which may be called the public bonds, designate him as the creditor, and expressly invest him with the correspondent rights.

To sequester or confiscate the stock, is as effectually a breach of the contract to pay, as to absorb it by a tax. It is to annihilate the promise, under the sanction of which the foreigner became a proprietor.

But, does not the general right of war, to seize and confiscate enemy property, extend to the property of the citizens of one nation in the funds of another—the two nations being at war with each other?

Resorting to principle as the guide, this question may, on solid grounds, be answered in the negative. The right to seize and confiscate individual property, in national wars, excludes all those cases where the individual derives his title from the enemy sovereign or nation: for the right to property always implies the right to be protected and secured in the enjoyment of that property; and a nation, by the very act of permitting the citizen of a foreign country to acquire property within its territory, whether to lands, funds, or to any other thing, tacitly engages to give protection and security to that property, and to allow him as full enjoyment of it as any other proprietor—an engagement which no state of things between the two nations can justly or reasonably affect. Though politically right, that, in wars between nations, the property of private persons, which depend on the laws of their own country, or on circumstances foreign to the nation with which their own is at war, should be subject to seizure and confiscation by the enemy nation; yet it is both politically and morally wrong, that this should extend to property acquired under the faith of the Government, and the laws of that enemy nation.

When the Government enters into a contract with the citizen of a foreign country, it considers him as an individual in a state of nature, and contracts with him as such. It does not contract with him as the member of another society.

The contracts, therefore, with him, cannot be affected by his political relations to that society. War, whatever right it may give over his other property, can give none over that which he derives from those contracts. The character in which they are made with him, the faith pledged to him personally, virtually exempt it.

This principle, which seems critically correct, would exempt as well the income as the capital of the property. It protects the use as effectually as the thing. What, in fact, is property, but a fiction, without the beneficial use of it? In many cases, indeed, the income or annuity is the property itself. And, though general usage may control the principle, it can only be as far as the usage clearly goes. It must not be extended by analogy.

Some of the most approved publicists, admitting the principle, qualify it with regard to the income of lands, which they say may be sequestered "to hinder the remittance of it to the enemy's country."

But the same authority affirms, that a State at war "does not so much as touch the sums which it owes to the enemy. Everywhere, in case of a war funds credited to the public, are exempt from confiscation and seizure." These expressions clearly exclude sequestration as well as confiscation.

The former, no less than the latter, would be inconsistent with the declaration that a State at war does not so much as touch the sums which it owes to the enemy, and that funds credited to the public are exempt from seizure. And, on full inquiry, it is believed that the suggestion, thus understood, is founded in fact.

Usage, then, however it may deviate in other particulars, in respect to public funds, concurs with principle in pronouncing, that they cannot rightfully be sequestered in time of war.

The usages of war still savor too much of the ferocious maxims of the times when war was the chief occupation of man. Enlightened reason would never have pronounced, that the persons or property of foreigners, found in a country at the breaking out of a war between that country and their own, were liable to any of the rigors which a state of war authorizes against the persons and goods of an enemy. It would have decreed to them an inviolable sanctuary in the faith of those permissions and those laws, by which themselves and their property had come under the jurisdiction where they were found. It would have rejected the trenchery of converting the indulgences and even rights of a previous state of amity, into snares for innocent individuals.

Happily, however, the practice of latter times has left several of those maxims little more than points of obsolete doctrine. They still retain their rank in theory; but usage has introduced so many qualifications, as nearly to destroy their operation.

This appears from the acknowledgment of writers, from the barrenness of modern history in examples of the application of those doctrines, from the opinions known to be generally current in Europe, and from a variety of articles which are constant formulas in treaties of the present century.

The United States are every way interested in the mitigation of the rigor of the ancient maxims of war. They cannot better demonstrate their wisdom, than by their moderation in this respect. Particularly interested in maintaining, in their greatest purity and energy, the principles of credit, they cannot too strictly adhere to all the relaxations of those maxims which favor the rights of creditors. No temporary advantage can compensate for the evils of a different course of conduct.

No temporary advantage can compensate for the evils of a different course of conduct.

Credit, public and private, is of the greatest consequence to every country. Of this, it might be emphatically called the invigorating principle. No well informed man can cast a retrospective eye over the progress of the United States, from their infancy to the present period, without being convinced that they owe, in a great degree, to the fostering influence of credit, their present mature growth. This credit has been of a mixed nature, mercantile and public, foreign and domestic. Credit abroad was the trunk of our mercantile credit, from which issued ramifications that nourished all the parts of domestic labor and industry. The bills of credit emitted, from time to time, by the different local Governments, which passed current as money, co-operated with that resource. Their united force, quickening the energies and bringing into action the capacities for improvement of a new country, was highly instrumental in accelerating its growth.

Credit, too, animated and supported by the general zeal, had a great share in accomplishing, without such violent expedients, as, generating universal distress, would have endangered the issue, that Revolution, of which we are so justly proud, and to which we are so greatly indebted.

Credit, likewise, may, no doubt, claim a principal agency in that increase of national and individual welfare since the establishment of the present Government, which is so generally felt and acknowledged, though the true causes of it are not as generally understood. It is the constant auxiliary of almost every public operation; has been an indispensable one in those measures by which our frontiers have been defended; and it would not be difficult to demonstrate, that, in a recent and delicate instance, has materially contributed to the safety of the State.

There can be no time, no state of things, in which credit is not essential to a nation, especially as long as nations in general continue to use it as a resource in war. It is impossible for a country to contend, on equal terms, or to be secure, against the enterprises of other nations, without being able equally with them to avail itself of this important resource; and to a young country, with moderate pecuniary capital, and not a very various industry, it is still more necessary than to countries more advanced in both. A truth not less weighty for being obvious and frequently noticed.

Public credit has been well defined to be, "a faculty to borrow, at pleasure, considerable sums on moderate terms; the art of distributing, over a succession of years, the extraordinary efforts, found indispensable in one; a mean of accelerating the prompt employment of all the abilities of a nation, and even of disposing of a part of the overplus of others."

This just and ingenious definition condenses to a point the principal arguments in favor of public credit, and displays its immense importance.

Let any man consult the actual course of our pecuniary operations, and let him then say whether credit be not eminently useful. Let him imagine the expense of a single campaign in a war with a great European Power; and let him then pronounce whether credit would not be indispensable. Let him decide whether it would be practicable, at all, to raise the necessary sum by taxes within the year, and let him judge what would be the degree of distress and oppression, which the attempt would occasion to the community. He cannot but conclude, that war, without credit, would be more than a great calamity—would be ruin.

But credit is not only one of the main pillars of the public safety; it is among the principal engines of useful enterprise and internal improvement. As a substitute for capital, it is little less useful than gold or silver, in agriculture, in commerce, in the manufacturing and mechanic arts.

The proof of this needs no labored deduction. It is matter of daily experience in the most familiar pursuits. One man wishes to take up and cultivate a piece of land; he purchases upon credit, and, in time, pays the purchase money out of the produce of the soil improved by his labor. Another sets up in trade; in the credit founded upon a fair character, he seeks, and often finds, the means of becoming, at length, a wealthy merchant. A third commences business as manufacturer or mechanic, with skill, but without money. It is by credit, that he is enabled to procure the tools, the materials, and even the subsistence of which he stands in need, until his industry has supplied him with capital; and, even then, he derives, from an established credit, and increased credit, the means of extending his undertakings.

Among the circumstances which recommend credit, and indicate its importance in the whole system of internal exertion and amelioration, it is impossible to pass, unnoticed, its unquestionable tendency to moderate the rate of interest—a circumstance of infinite value in all the operations of labor and industry.

If the individual capital of this country has become more adequate to its exigencies than formerly, it is because individuals have found new resources in the Public Credit—in the funds to which that has given value and activity. Let Public Credit be prostrated, and the deficiency will be greater than before. Public and Private Credit are closely allied, if not inseparable. There is, perhaps, no example of the one being in a flourishing, where the other was in a bad, state. A shock to Public Credit, would, therefore, not only take away the additional means which it has furnished, but, by the derangements, disorders, distrusts, and false principles, which it would engender and disseminate, would diminish the antecedent resources of Private Credit.

The United States possess an immense mass of improvable matter; the development of it, continually making, may be said to enlarge the field of improvement as it progresses; and, though the active capital of the country has, no doubt, considerably increased, it is probable that it does not bear, at present, a much greater proportion to the objects of employment than it has done at any former period. Credit, upon this hypothesis, of every kind, is nearly as necessary to us now, as it ever was. But, at least, it may be affirmed, with absolute certainty, that, to a country so situated, credit is peculiarly useful and important.

If the United States observe, with delicate caution, the maxims of credit, as well towards foreigners as their own citizens, in connexion with the general principles of an upright, stable, and systematic administration, the strong attractions which they present to foreign capital will be likely to insure them the command of as much as they may want, in addition to their own, for every species of internal amelioration.

Can it be doubted, that they would derive from this, in a course of time, advantages incomparably greater than any, however tempting, that could partially result from a disregard of those maxims, or from the exercise of a questionable right, which should even appear to derogate from them?

Credit is an entire thing. Every part of it has the nicest sympathy with every other part; wound one limb, and the whole tree shrinks and decays.

The security of each creditor is inseparable from the security of all creditors. The boundary between foreigner and citizen would not be deemed a sufficient barrier against extending the precedent of an invasion of the rights of the former to the latter. The most judicious and cautious would be most apt to reason thus, and would only look for stronger shades of apparent necessity or expediency to govern the extension. And, in affairs of credit, the opinions of the judicious and cautious may be expected to prevail. Hence the Government, by sequestering the property of foreign citizens in the public funds, at the commencement of a war, would impair, at least, if not destroy, that credit which is the best resource in war.

It is in vain to attempt to disparage credit, by objecting to its abuses. What is there not liable to abuse or misuse? The precious metals, those great springs of labor and industry, are also the ministers of extravagance, luxury, and corruption. Commerce, the nurse of agriculture and manufactures, if overdriven, leads to bankruptcy and distress. A fertile soil, the principal source of human comfort, not unfrequently begets indolence and effeminacy. Even liberty itself, degenerating into licentiousness, produces a frightful complication of ills, and works its own destruction.

It is wisdom, in every case, to cherish whatever is useful, and guard against its abuse. It will be the true policy of the United States, to give all possible energy to Public Credit, by a firm adherence to its strictest maxims; and yet, to avoid the ills of an excessive employment of it, by true economy and system in the public expenditures; by steadily cultivating peace; and by using sincere, efficient, and persevering endeavors to diminish present debts, prevent the accumulation of new, and secure the discharge, within a reasonable period, of such as it may be, at any time, matter of necessity to contract. It will be wise to cultivate and foster Private Credit, by an exemplary observance of the principles of Public Credit, and to guard against the misuse of the former, by a speedy and vigorous administration of justice, and by taking away every temptation to run in debt, founded in the hope of evading the just claims of creditors.

As an honorable evidence of this disposition, and with a view to quiet the alarms which have been excited, and to silence, forever, a question which can never be agitated without serious inconvenience, the Secretary of the Treasury, in the last place, respectfully submits:

That there be an express renunciation, by law, of all pretension of right to tax the public funds, or to sequester, at any time, or on any pretext, the property which foreign citizens may hold therein. This will be particularly essential to the success of the plan for converting the foreign into domestic debt; as the present contracts for the Amsterdam and Antwerp debt contain an equivalent stipulation, and there is no prospect that the creditors would consent to a change, but upon the condition of a like stipulation.

In the commencement of this report, it was the intention to submit some propositions for the improvement of the several branches of the public revenue; but it is deemed advisable to reserve this part of the subject for a future communication. All which is respectfully submitted.

ALEXANDER HAMILTON,
Secretary of the Treasury.

View of Sinking Fund, according to plan proposed in the Report.

Present annual amount of Sinking Fund, supposing the investment of the residue of the surplus of revenue to the end of 1790, and of the arrears of interest on the debt to foreign officers, in the purchase of six per cent stock, at par, and exonerating the fund from the charge to which it is subject by the last section of the act making provision for the reduction of the Public Debt, viz:

Interest for a year on stock actually purchased and redeemed, to the last of December, 1794, and carried to the credit of the fund	- $68,225 55
Interest for a year on the principal and arrears of interest, to the end of 1790, on the debt to foreign officers	- 11,892 44
Interest for a year on subsequent arrears of interest, not included in the above	- 1,547 05
Interest for a year on $411,659 49, being the unexpended balance of surplus to the end of 1790	- 24,699 56
	- $106,364 60

Interest for a year on the Loan Office certificates, bearing interest on the nominal principal which (these certificates being paid off as proposed) would accrue to this fund. Add this sum, to be appropriated out of the revenue from imports and tonnage, for the redemption of stock, bearing a present interest of six per cent, according to the fifth proposition in the report

The amount of two per cent on $25,820,512 20, being the amount of stock unredeemed, bearing a present interest of six per cent, exclusive of State balances	- $516,410 24
--	----------------

Dividends on Bank stock, deducting interest on such instalments of the Loan of the Bank as had not accrued in the year 1794

Sum to be paid in addition thereto, on the 1st of January, 1796, out of the revenues from imports and tonnage, for reimbursement of the 4th instalment of the above Loan	- $62,500 00
	- 137,500 00

Amount of annual instalments of $2,000,000 had of the Bank of the United States, pursuant to the 11th section of the act of incorporation

	- $200,000 00
--	----------------

The surplus of the dividends on Bank stock will increase each year $12,000; the interest, liberated by payment of each annual instalment of principal, and the sum to be paid out of the revenue, will annually decrease in the same ratio.

It will be, after the first year—
On the 1st of January, 1797	- $125,500
On the 1st of January, 1798	- 113,500
On the 1st of January, 1799	- 101,500
On the 1st of January, 1800	- 89,500
On the 1st of January, 1801	- 77,500
On the 1st of January, 1802	- 65,500

The yearly average of the sum successively payable out of the revenue from imports and tonnage, towards reimbursing the two million Loan, will be $101,500 00. And the whole Loan being discharged on the 1st of January, 1803, the annual dividend on Bank stock will be liberated from the future payment of interest on the Loan, and will thenceforth yield to the Sinking Fund an annuity liable to the redemption of the deferred stock

Two per centum of $12,478,827 96, the amount of unredeemed stock, which on the 1st of January, 1801, will bear interest at six per centum per annum, exclusive of State balances, and which will be payable on the 1st of January, 1802, is	- 152,500 00
	- 249,576 75

Public Credit.

Yearly interest, which, on the 1st of January, 1801, will begin to accrue to the Sinking Fund, in the deferred stock standing to its credit, is $52,319 97. Further sum necessary for payment of the above two per centum

	- 197,256 78
	- $249,576 75

This sum of $197,256 78 will, in the years 1802, 1803, be payable out of the revenues from imports and tonnage. But the yearly dividends on Bank stock, free from charge after the 1st of January, 1803, being

	- $152,500 00
--	----------------

The sum thenceforth payable out of the revenues from imports and tonnage, for payment of said two per centum, will be

	- 44,756 78
Which, together with the yearly interest on deferred stock, being	- 52,319 97
	- $249,576 75

Is equal to the amount of redeeming annuity of deferred stock, being

	- $249,576 75
--	----------------

Hence the permanent appropriations out of the revenue from imports and tonnage, for the redemption of the whole of the unredeemed funded stock, which now bears, and hereafter will bear, an interest of six per centum per annum, exclusive of the stock standing to the credit of certain States, pursuant to the report of the Commissioners, is

For that bearing a present interest	- $408,134 64
For that bearing a future interest	- 44,756 78
	- $452,891 42

Total annual extra appropriation to Sinking Fund, out of the revenues, exclusive of Bank dividends

	- $452,891 42
--	----------------

The whole of the stock bearing a present rate of interest, will, by this fund, be redeemed in something less than twenty-three years, and the interest then set free, to wit, in the year 1818, will be

	- $1,631,259 72
To which add the further appropriation towards principal, as above	- 408,134 64
	- $2,039,394 36

This annuity, applied to payments or purchases of the Foreign Debt, on a calculation of five per cent interest, would, by the 1st of January, 1824, extinguish that Debt, and yield a surplus of

	- $122,502 29
--	----------------

The whole of the stock bearing a future interest of six per cent., will, by the fund to be applied to it as above, be also redeemed in something less than twenty-three years from the time of commencing the redemption, that is, by the year 1824, and the interest then set free on that stock, will be

	- $801,050 24
The sum appropriated towards the redemption, then also set free, is	- 197,256 78
To which, add the sum liberated by the redemption of the present six per cent. stock	- 2,039,394 36
And the interest on $13,745,379 35, being the amount of the Foreign Debt extinguished as above	- 638,480 58
	- $3,676,181 96

There will, therefore, be an annuity of

	- $3,676,181 96
--	------------------

Thus will the whole of the Foreign Debt be extinguished by the year 1824, and the Sinking Fund will then possess an annuity of

	- $3,676,181 96
And a sum, in gross, of	- 122,502 29
	- $3,798,684 25

Together

	- $3,798,684 25

Which, in two years, would more than pay off the whole of the balances to creditor States, and the whole of the unfunded Debt, if not sooner discharged.

So that, supposing the proceeds of the Western lands to be sufficient, by the same time, to redeem the three per cent. stock, the whole of the present Debt of the United States, foreign and domestic, funded and unfunded, may be redeemed by the operation of the provision proposed by the fifth proposition, by the year 1826; and there would revert to the United States a yearly revenue of $4,435,320 89.

SUPPLEMENT TO STATEMENT F.

View of the probable produce of the additional duties on imports laid by the act of June 7, 1794.

Articles on which duties are laid by the act of June 7, 1794.	Amount imported in 1793.	Amount imported in 1794.	Rate.	Amount of duties calculated on importation of the two years.
Coffee, pounds	3,566,441	34,458,178	At 1 cent	1792. 885,664 41
Cocoa, pounds	530,169	1,455,408	At 2 cents	1793. 334,456 16
Refined sugar	235,680	400,000	At 5 cents	20,000 00
Clayed sugar	91,287	3,739,775	At 1 cent	37,397 75
Miscellany, being smaller enumerated articles			Various	31,424 18
Articles to which 5 per cent. is added, value	4,882,118 51	4,882,118 51	5 per cent.	241,605 92
Articles to which 2½ per cent. is added, value	15,510,183 81	15,510,183 81	2½ per cent.	387,754 59
				1,091,873 32

Difference between 1792 and 1793, is $322,833 47, which may be justly considered as an extra importation, depending on peculiar and known circumstances of the war in Europe, and which, in all probability, will be wholly drawn back on exportation.

The proceeds of these duties may therefore be thus stated:

Amount computed on the importation of 1793
Deduct for usual drawbacks on exportation and expenses of collection, 10 per cent. - $769,048 85
Probable nett annual product of additional duties - $692,143 97

It is to be observed, however, that the considerable additions made upon the miscellaneous articles, and upon refined sugar, will probably have prohibitory effect, and that the items relative to them cannot be much counted upon.

Result, in the year 1796, according to 5th proposition.

Surplus of revenue brought forward	$1,070,456 90
Increased interest on Foreign Debt	$67,291 89
Interest on new emission	4,528 70
Ten per cent. of arrears of unfunded interest, including indents	48,309 53
Yearly instalment on account of $1,000,000 Loan for foreign interest	200,000 00
Appropriations for Sinking Fund, viz:
Dividends of Bank stock	$62,500 00
Sum payable out of imports and tonnage for redemption of six per cent. stock	408,134 64
Sum payable on the 1st of January, 1796, towards reimbursing of Bank Loan	137,500 00
	608,134 64
Balance, being excess of revenue beyond expenditure	928,364 76
	$143,193 14

It appears by statement F, that these extra appropriations will, in the progress of the operation, be reduced; and that, including a provision for the redemption of the deferred Debt, the permanent charge on the revenue (exclusive of Bank dividends) for the Sinking Fund, will be no more than $452,891 42.

IMPROVEMENT OF THE REVENUE.

[Communicated to the House of Representatives, February 2, 1796.]

THE SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY respectfully makes the following report to the House of Representatives:

According to the present laws, imposing duties on articles imported into the United States, not much short of one-third of the whole amount of the duties is derived from articles rated ad valorem.

In other nations, where this branch of revenue, as with us, is of principal or very considerable consequence, and where no peculiarity of situation has tended to keep the rates of duty low, experience has led to contract more and more the number of articles rated ad valorem, and of course to extend the number of those rated specifically, that is, according to weight, measure, or other rule of quantity.

The reason of this is obvious. It is to guard against evasions which infallibly happen, in a greater or less degree, where duties are high. It is impossible for the merchants of any country to have manifested more probity than those of the United States, on this subject; and it is firmly believed, that there never was one in which illicit practices, to the disadvantage of the revenue, have obtained so little as hitherto in this; yet, it would be a delusive expectation, that, with duties so considerable as those which now exist, a disposition will not be experienced, in some individuals who carry on our import trade, to evade the payment of them, and this to an extent sufficient to make it prudent to guard with circumspection, and by every reasonable precaution against the success of such attempts. It is needless to repeat, that this will contribute as much to the interest of the fair trader as to that of the revenue.

It is believed that, in our system, the method of rating ad valorem could, with convenience, be brought within a much narrower compass; and it is evident that, to do so, will contribute materially to the security of the revenue.

The Secretary has not hitherto had leisure to digest the details of a plan for this purpose; but, if the idea is approved, it can be carried with due accuracy into effect, at a future session, by an order upon the Head of this Department to prepare, in the mean time, a tariff proportioned to the actual rates of duty.

It may also be found expedient, with a similar view, to adjust anew the proportional rates of duty, of different kinds or qualities, of certain articles. This observation is believed to apply, with particular force, to teas. It would be, in the opinion of the Secretary, advisable to throw them into three classes; to raise somewhat the lowest rate, and to diminish considerably the higher rates. A persuasion is entertained, founded partly upon observation of the course of importations, that a revaluation of this kind would benefit the revenue. The same thing might be conveniently extended to some other articles.

Advantages will also accrue from a readjustment of the rates, in certain cases, by combining several rates on the same articles, established by different acts into one rate, and by dismissing inconvenient fractions, which serve to perplex the calculation of the duties. Some alteration in the terms of credit for duties may, it is conceived, be made with advantage. Where four months are allowed, three and six months may be substituted; and three, six, nine, and twelve, or even three, six, nine, twelve, and fifteen, to the cases of six, nine, and twelve months. This will apportion the course of receipts more according to the course of payments, and prevent inconvenient pressures at particular junctures.

The compensations to inspectors, especially in the ports, where the expense of living is great, and to collectors and surveyors in the less productive ports, urgently demand revision, in order to an increase of them.

The security of the revenue, in every branch, turns (it will not be too strong to say) principally upon the officers of the lowest grade. Hence, it is a policy no less mistaken than common, to leave those officers without such compensations as will admit of a proper selection of character, and to prevent the temptation, from indigence, to abuse the trust. It is certain that, in many places, the present allowance to inspectors, on the most liberal application of it, is inadequate to those important ends.

A similar reasoning will apply to those officers of the principal grades, who, being in districts which produce little, are ill compensated by the emoluments to which they are at present entitled. It cannot escape, that the safety of the revenue must depend on equal fidelity and due vigilance in all the districts; else it may become in many cases, worth the while to resort to particular districts, because there is a deficiency of the one or the other. Besides, that it is in itself just and proper, that all who are in the public service should receive adequate rewards for their time, attention, and trouble.

The aggregate expense of collecting the duties on impost and tonnage, is at present truly moderate—a circumstance which facilitates the extension of allowances where they are necessary. The system of the revenue cutters needs revision. The utility of every institution depends on the competency of the agents who are to execute it. The present compensations to officers and men, compared with what may be obtained in other similar employment, unaided by collateral motives, creates a degree of embarrassment which very much impairs the usefulness of the thing. It would have been, in the judgment of the Secretary, a great mean of rendering it competent to its object, if, as was early suggested by him, the officers of the customs had had rank in the Navy of the United States.

With regard to that branch of revenue which is constituted by the duties upon spirits distilled within the United States, and upon stills, it is believed that it would be an improvement, and one which could be now made without inconvenience.

ence, to abolish the option to pay by the gallon, of the spirits distilled, in the cases where the duties are charged on the stills. This will leave the alternative of paying by the year, or for less periods, upon licenses, at the choice of the party; an alternative which affords sufficient accommodation to the difference of circumstances. The option to pay by the gallon, of the spirits distilled, according to an account to be rendered on the oath of the party, though expedient in the first experiment of the law, is objectionable, as a permanent regulation, in a double view.

The additional discretionary latitude given to compensations to the officers concerned in the collection of those duties, is restricted to a term which will expire at the end of the next session of Congress. It will be essential to extend it, or to fix the compensations which shall have been allowed. It is believed that further experience will still be useful towards a definite Legislative adjustment.

Embarrassments are experienced from the want of a concurrent authority in these officers, similar to that of the officers of the customs, to make seizures within each other's surveys and divisions. On the borders of such as are adjacent, the officers are exposed to hazard in making seizures, and better opportunities are afforded of escaping detection.

The revenue to result from the act of the last session, laying duties upon licenses to retailers of wines and distilled spirits, may be improved, favorably to proportional equality, by changing the form.

One license, for selling one or more kinds of wines, puts the greatest and the smallest dealer upon the same footing, and is so far inequitable. To class wines into a few obvious and strongly marked discriminations, and to render a license necessary for each class, with a duty upon each license, would favor a just distribution of the tax among great and small dealers, and would, at the same time, benefit the revenue. The classes may be as follows: 1st. Madeira wine. 2d. Sherry wine. 3d. Port wine. 4th. Other wines.

To secure the effect of the discrimination in favor of small dealers, who may be in the practice of selling and sending out different kinds of wines in small quantities, it may be provided that not more than one license shall be necessary to any dealer, who never sells or sends out at any one time more than three gallons. And suitable penalties may be annexed to guard the condition of the exemption.

Similar observations are applicable to licenses to retailers of spirituous liquors. These may be thrown into three classes: 1st. Spirits distilled from the grape, commonly called brandy. 2d. Spirits distilled from the produce of the sugar cane, commonly called rum. 3d. Other distilled spirits; and there may be a like provision in favor of dealers who never sell or send out more than three gallons at one time.

Distillers may be put, in this respect, as to the spirits they distill, upon the same footing with importers; that is, they may be exempt from the license duty; but it would seem proper to annex these conditions to the exemption, that they shall not sell and send out a less quantity, in one cask, vessel, or package, than ten gallons; and that they shall not deal in the selling at retail of any other spirits than those they themselves distill.

Or, another rule may be adopted, for proportioning the tax to the extent of the dealing; which is, to add to the present rate of the license certain supplemental rates, according to the yearly rent of yearly value, by appraisement, of the house or building in which the retailers of wines or spirituous liquors shall carry on the business.

This has been found, in practice, a convenient and, upon the whole, an equitable rule of proportion; evidently more so than one license with the same duty to all dealers indiscriminately.

It is a general and a wise national policy, to make these articles of wine and spirits as contributory to the revenue as they can be made; which can only be effected by subdividing the duties upon them in the different stages of their passage to the consumer. The branch under consideration might be an important one. As it is now regulated, it is feared that it may prove of considerable consequence. The confining of the licenses for selling spirituous liquors to foreign spirits, must give great facility to evasions. And it has an unequal operation upon different portions of the community.

It would promote the object of the act, which imposes duties on sales at auction, to allow two-and-a-half per centum to each auctioneer, in lieu of the one per centum allowed by the ninth section of that act. It is believed that the present allowance is insufficient to defray the expense of clerkship incident to a compliance with the requisitions of the law, which cannot be rendered less particular or exact without prejudice to the revenue.

The tax upon snuff, according to a rate per pound, will be liable to very great evasions, without regulations for a close inspection of the course of the business. Dispensing with these, it seems advisable to modify the tax upon a different plan. The proposition to lay it upon the mortar is as good a substitute as has occurred. It appears, upon evidence which is credited, that a snuff mill usually works about one half the year; that is, one hundred and fifty-six working days in a year; and yields, per mortar, of the whole number of mortars contained in a mill, an average of forty-five pounds of snuff per day. It follows, that five hundred and sixty-one dollars and sixty-six cents per mortar, per annum, is the equivalent of the present duty of eight cents per pound. There are objections to this form of the tax; but, as it appears to be generally desired by the manufacturers, it seems advisable to forego them; especially as the present plan demands far more rigorous precautions for the effectual collection of the duty than now exist, or than would be deemed expedient.

A similar difficulty attends the tax upon refined sugar; but a proper substitute for the present plan is not perceived. It will fortify the revenue, and produce no undue inconvenience to the manufacturer, if he be required to annex a ticket or tickets to each loaf of sugar, specifying the weight in pounds; and to each cask, barrel, keg, box, or other package of refined sugar, specifying the contents and weight in pounds, corresponding certified or tickets to accompany imported refined sugar. The kinds of tickets to be furnished by the respective supervisors, and accounted to for them. The observance of this regulation to be secured by proper penalties.

The act which lays a duty on carriages for the conveyance of persons, exempts from the duty carriages usually and chiefly employed in husbandry, and in carrying commodities. It is a material defect in this act, as has been already experienced, that it provides no summary mode for determining what carriages are within the exempting description. Now, every disputed case must be the subject of a suit in all the legal forms, which is equally objectionable on the score of delay and expense. It is not perceived that any insurmountable difficulty lies in the way of providing a remedy consistently with a due deference, in the last resort, to the Judiciary authority.

In revenue laws, too much is as great a fault as too little simplicity. It leaves them unprovisional—incapable of execution in a manner convenient either to the public or to individuals. The acts imposing duties on licenses for selling wines and spirituous liquors at retail, and upon sales at auction, authorize allowances not exceeding two-and-a-half per cent. for compensation to officers, and for incidental expenses. The acts laying duties upon carriages for the conveyance of persons, and upon snuff and refined sugar, make no provision for such compensations, or other expenses of collection. It is the opinion of the Secretary that the rate of two-and-a-half per cent. in the two first mentioned acts is inadequate—that it ought to be extended to five per cent., and that an equal provision should be made for the expense of collection under the two last-mentioned acts.

The restrictions upon officers of the customs, and upon the supervisors and other officers of inspection, with regard to the Public Funds, appear to the Secretary unnecessary and inconvenient—unnecessary, because those officers, having no concern whatever with any branch of public business that respects the management of the funds, can have no official influence upon the policy or execution of the measures which regard them, further than by a punctual collection of the revenues—inconvenient, because it deprives them of a mean of investing any little sums they may save or acquire, in a mode very convenient to men who, from situation, are less liable to avail themselves of other opportunities. If the being stockholders can have any influence upon them as officers, it must be of a kind favorable to the public service, by increasing their personal interest in the exact collection of the revenue. If the idea which dictated the restrictions was, that they might use the public money in speculations in stock, the answer is, that this is not in their power; from the rapidity with which it is transferred to the Treasury: and if it were practicable for them to divert the public money, and a disposition to do it should in any case exist, it might operate through other channels. In lieu of the restrictions concerning the funds, the employment of public money for private purposes may, if thought necessary, be still further guarded against by penalties. Those restrictions in reference to the immediate officers of the Treasury Department and the Commissioners of Loans are entirely proper, and ought to be maintained; but it is believed that it is not only useless, but injurious, to give them greater extension. The multiplication of restrictions on the public officers will render greater compensations necessary, and be a source of expense to the public.

All which is respectfully submitted.

ALEXANDER HAMILTON,
Secretary of the Treasury.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, January 31, 1795.

NOTE.—Since the conclusion of this Report, the Secretary has learnt that a bill (the progress of which his peculiar situation had prevented his observing) has actually passed the two Houses, for changing the terms of six, nine, and twelve months, into eight, ten, and twelve. This bill, besides interfering disadvantageously with arrangements of the Treasury, founded upon the existing provisions of the laws, will, it is apprehended, tend to increase an inconvenience which the above suggestions are meant to lessen—the too great concentration of mercantile payments. Any accidental derangement of the mercantile body from overtrading or other cause would, in this situation, endanger consequences to the Treasury which it might be difficult to meet by other expedients; whereas, a subdivision into shorter and more numerous periods, by diminishing the effect, would admit, in such cases, of an easy substitute. The merchants themselves are particularly interested in this question; for the reaction upon them of any embarrassment of the Treasury might render that a general and lasting mischief which might otherwise have been only a partial and transient disorder.

THE NATIONAL DEFENCE.

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, December 10, 1794.

SIR: In obedience to the orders of the President of the United States, I have the honor to submit to the House of Representatives a statement of such difficulties and inconveniences as have occurred in the execution of the act, entitled "An act more effectually to provide for the national defence by establishing a uniform militia throughout the United States."

I have the honor to be, with great respect, your obedient servant,

H. KNOX, Secretary of War.

The SPEAKER of the House of Representatives of the U. S.

The SECRETARY OF WAR, in obedience to the orders of the President of the United States, respectfully submits the following statement of such difficulties and inconveniences as have occurred in the execution of the act, entitled "An act more effectually to provide for the national defence by establishing a uniform militia throughout the United States."

That a difficulty of primary importance appears to oppose the execution of the first section of the before-recited act. The militia are requested to arm and equip themselves at their own expense, but there is no penalty to enforce the injunction of the law.

The subscriber is informed that several States have passed auxiliary laws to the act of Congress. The laws of the following States upon this subject are in his possession, to wit: Massachusetts, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Maryland, and North Carolina.

The penalties by these for non-equipment and armament appear to be according to the following extracts:

Massachusetts—passed June 23, 1793.

"And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, That every non-commissioned officer or private of the infantry who shall neglect to keep himself armed and equipped as aforesaid, or who shall on a muster-day, or at any other time of examination, be destitute of, or appear unprovided with the arms and equipments herein directed, (except as before excepted,) shall pay a fine not exceeding twenty shillings, in proportion to the articles of which he shall be deficient, at the discretion of the Justice of the Peace before whom trial shall be had. And all parents, masters, and guardians, shall furnish those of the said militia who shall be under their care and command, with the arms and equipments before-mentioned, under the like penalties for any neglect. And whenever the Selectmen of any town shall judge any inhabitant thereof belonging to the militia unable to arm and equip himself in manner as aforesaid, they shall, at the expense of the town, provide for and furnish such inhabitant with the aforesaid arms and equipments, which shall remain the property of the town at the expense of which they shall be provided. And if any soldier shall embezzle or destroy the arms and equipments with which he shall be furnished, he shall, upon conviction before some Justice of the Peace, be adjudged to replace the article or articles which shall by him be so embezzled or destroyed, and to pay the cost from the process arising against him. And if he shall not perform the same within fourteen days after such adjudication, it shall be in the power of the Selectmen of the town to which he shall belong, to bind him out to service or labor for such term or time as shall, in the discretion of the said Justice, be sufficient to procure a sum of money equal to the value of the article or articles so embezzled or destroyed, and pay cost arising as aforesaid."

New Jersey—passed June 5, 1793.

"And if any such militiaman shall appear, when called out to exercise or into service, without a musket or rifle, he shall forfeit and pay the sum of three shillings and ninepence, and for want of every other of the aforesaid articles, six pence. Each and every man so enrolled as aforesaid, and providing himself with the arms, ammunition, and accoutrements required as aforesaid, shall hold the same exempted from all suits, distresses, executions or sales for debt, or the payment of taxes: Provided always, That whenever the majors of any battalion shall judge any person enrolled therein unable to arm and equip himself as aforesaid, such person shall not be subject to any fine for not arming; anything herein contained to the contrary notwithstanding."

Pennsylvania—passed April 11, 1793.

"Provided always, That whenever the field-officers of any regiment shall judge any person enrolled therein unable to arm and equip himself as aforesaid, such person shall not be subject to any fine for not arming; anything herein contained to the contrary notwithstanding."

It does not appear that any specified penalty is imposed by this act on persons neglecting to arm and equip themselves.

Maryland—passed at November Session, 1793.

"And any non-commissioned officer or matron, in the artillery, and any non-commissioned officer or dragoon, who shall so refuse or neglect to attend on any of the said days, armed and accoutred as aforesaid, (except as before excepted,) shall forfeit a sum not exceeding two-thirds of a dollar per day: and all other non-commissioned officers and privates who shall refuse or neglect to attend, armed and accoutred as herein before directed, (except as before excepted,) shall forfeit and pay one cent per day, unless excused, for appearing without arms and accoutrements, by the commanding officers of their respective companies for the day."

North Carolina—passed July 18, 1794.

"And every non-commissioned officer and private who shall fail to appear on the said occasions, shall forfeit for every such failure or neglect, ten shillings; or if appearing, he be not armed and provided in a manner as directed in this act, shall, for such deficiency, forfeit and pay five shillings. And if the officers of a company, or any two of them, after an examination upon oath, shall adjudge any person or persons enrolled as aforesaid, to be incapable of providing and furnishing him or themselves with the arms, ammunition, and accoutrements required by this act, they shall make report thereof to the next battalion court-martial, as the case may be, who may, if it should appear necessary, exempt such person or persons from the fines and forfeitures by this act imposed, until such arms and accoutrements shall be provided and delivered him or them by the court martial, who shall take security for the safe-keeping of such arms and accoutrements, to be returned when required."

But it is certain that, were the penalties greatly enhanced, an insuperable difficulty would occur in obtaining the requisite number of arms in any

The Mint.

Preservation of Peace with the Indians.

3. That all persons who shall be assembled or embodied in arms on any lands belonging to Indians out of the ordinary jurisdiction of any State, or of the Territory South of the Ohio, for the purpose of warring against the Indians, or of committing depredations upon any Indian town, or persons, or property, shall thereby become liable and subject to the rules and articles of war, which are or shall be established for the government of the troops of the United States." This was a session of a bill which the Senate passed the last session, entitled "An act for the more effectual protection of the Southwestern frontiers," but it was disagreed to by the House.

It seems that our own experience would demonstrate the propriety of endeavoring to preserve a pacific conduct in preference to a hostile one with the Indian tribes. The United States can get nothing by an Indian war, but they risk men, money, and reputation. As we are more powerful and more enlightened than they are, there is a responsibility of national character, that we should treat them with kindness and even liberality. It is a melancholy reflection, that our modes of population have been more destructive to the Indian natives than the conduct of the conquerors of Mexico and Peru. The evidence of this is the utter extirpation of nearly all the Indians in most populous parts of the Union. A future historian may mark the causes of this destruction of the human race in sable colors. Although the present Government of the United States cannot, with propriety, be involved in the opprobrium, yet, it seems necessary, however, in order to render their attention upon this subject strongly characteristic of their justice, that some powerful attempts should be made to tranquilize the frontiers, particularly those South of the Ohio. The situation of the settlements on Cumberland loudly demands the interference and protection of Government. It is true some unauthorized offensive operations have proceeded from thence against the lower Cherokee towns, and victims were sacrificed. Whether these victims were all warriors, or whether women and children were not involved in the destruction, seems to merit inquiry.

Upon the most mature reflection, the subscriber has been able to bestow upon this subject, arising from the experience of several years' observation thereof, he humbly conceives all attempts to preserve the peace with the Indian tribes, will be found inadequate, short of an arrangement somewhat like the following, to wit:

1. That a line of military posts, at such distances as shall be directed, be established upon the frontiers within the Indian boundary, and out of the ordinary jurisdiction of any State, provided consent can be obtained for the purpose from the Indian tribes; that these posts be garrisoned with regular troops under the direction of the President of the United States.

2. That if any murder or theft be committed upon any of the white inhabitants, by an Indian known to belong to any Indian nation or tribe, such nation or tribe shall be bound to deliver him or them up to the nearest military post, in order to be tried and punished by a court-martial, or in failure thereof the United States will take satisfaction upon the nearest Indian town belonging to such nation or tribe.]

3. That if any murder or theft be committed upon any of the white inhabitants, by an Indian known to belong to any Indian nation or tribe, such nation or tribe shall be bound to deliver him or them up to the nearest military post, in order to be tried and punished by a court-martial, or in failure thereof the United States will take satisfaction upon the nearest Indian town belonging to such nation or tribe.]

reasonable period. The numbers comprehended in the act, from eighteen to forty-five years of age, inclusively, deducting the exempt and mariners, may be estimated probably at about four hundred and fifty thousand men. Of these, probably not one hundred thousand are armed as the act requires, although a greater number might be found of common and ordinary muskets without bayonets. The deficiency cannot be supplied from Europe, under the present circumstances. The only solid resource to obtain a supply, is the establishment of manufacturing in each State.

The deficiency of arms cannot be more forcibly exemplified than that, to arm the militia lately called into service, estimated at fifteen thousand, the number of ten thousand arms have been issued from the public Arsenal. Loss and injury must be expected to arise upon the articles issued. No adequate provision appears to be established by the act for securing the obedience of the militia to the call of the Executive of the United States. It would seem essential that any law which the Congress should pass upon the subject of the militia should contain within itself all the necessary provisions for its complete execution.

The late experiment proves, at least in some parts, that the laws were inefficient; and had it not been for voluntary zeal which came to its aid, the community might have experienced great evils. It would appear to be essential, that when the militia are in actual service, they ought to be bound by the military code of the United States. The enrolment of men of the ages specified in the act, notwithstanding the exemptions; holding them responsible for military service, and enforcing the same, appears to be a circumstance which may operate injuriously to the industry and convenience of the community.

Of the returns enjoined by the tenth section of the said act, the following only have been received:

STATE.	From act to forty.	Forty to sixty.	Total.
Massachusetts	54,428	22,319	77,247
Connecticut	-	-	16,851
New Jersey	-	-	25,887
Georgia	-	-	10,120

Whether the act in question is susceptible of such alterations and amendments, on its present principles, as will secure the advantages to be derived from a well-organized militia, or whether a limited, but a select and efficient corps of militia formed on a principle of rotation or otherwise, and taken from the classes least injurious to the industry of the community, would not better fulfil that object, and, at the same time, better comport with economy, are questions which the wisdom of Congress alone is competent to decide. All which is submitted.

beg leave to make a statement of the effect of their inquiries, under the following heads:

1. The officers of the institution, and their actual duties.
2. The present state and progress of the works.
3. The expenses attending the institution to this time.
4. The improvements yet necessary to render the institution beneficial to the United States.
5. The stock now on hand.
6. The quantity of coin that may be produced when the works are complete.
7. The keeping of the accounts, with the checks necessary to prevent peculation.

1. As to the Officers of the Mint, and their actual duties.

The Director, whose duties, besides those contained in the act instituting the Mint, are the general superintendence of the whole business, in all its various departments, the making or approving of all contracts and purchases relative to the improvements, buildings, machines, and whatever may be thought necessary for promoting the utility of the Mint; and, lastly, to inspect all receipts and issues of the Mint, with the accounts of the expenditure, and to draw warrants for the same.

The Assayer.—He assays all metals brought to the Mint, and reports their respective qualities to the Treasurer for his direction. He attends and inspects the Melters and Refiners, and has charge of the bullion jointly with the Treasurer and Chief Coiner. He has, hitherto, also had the care of the melting and refining all the precious metals that have come to the Mint.

The Chief Coiner prepares all the necessary machines belonging to the different branches of coining the several metals directed by law; works all the ingots received from the Melters and Refiners into a proper state for coining, and, when completed, delivers them over to the Treasurer; and, lastly, oversees all the different workmen employed in the coining, and keeps them in their duty.

The Engraver, whose actual duties are the raising and furnishing all punches that are requisite for the completion of the dies, the engraving and sinking all original dies, and raising all hubs that are struck out of them. He has an assistant occasionally, as the business is urgent.

The Treasurer, whose duty it is to take charge of all bullion received or deposited in the Mint for coining. He delivers it out as wanted for working, and receives in return all the coins as they are completed from the Chief Coiner. He registers all the qualities of the metals as reported by the Assayer, and pays out all the coins, when completed, on the warrants of the Secretary of the Treasury and Director, makes all payments on account of the Mint, and renders his account every three months to the Treasury of the United States.

The Clerks.—At present there are three clerks; one of them performs all writings relative to the Mint, required of him by the Director and Assayer.

er, makes out all orders of the Director, and keeps regular entries of the same. He keeps an account of all bullion received and delivered by the Assayer, acting in the capacity of refiner, and does such out-of-door business, for the use of the Mint, as is required of him by the Director or Assayer. He also keeps an account of the workmen employed, pays them their wages, and procures the necessary materials.

One other is clerk to the Chief Coiner, whose duty it is to keep an account how much and what metal is received by the Chief Coiner from the Treasurer, and of the sum returned in coin. He weighs out daily, the several metals to the proper workmen, and receives it back at night, by weight of which he keeps the proper entries. He makes out the pay rolls for the Director's inspection, on which warrants on the Treasurer are based. He is present at the payment of the workmen, and takes their receipts. He also keeps the accounts of the contingent expenses attending the institution.

The remaining clerk belongs to the Treasurer, and keeps all accounts relative to his receipts, issues, and expenditures, whether of bullion, coin, or payments. He also weighs the bullion in the first instance, registers the quantity of alloy, and counts the coin issued from the Mint. Each clerk receives a salary of $500 per annum, except the Treasurer's, who receives from the Director, out of his own salary, an addition of $300 per annum.

2. The present state and progress of the works.

The houses are built on three lots of ground, in Seventh street, between Market and Arch streets, the fee simple of which is vested in the United States, and one in the Northern Liberties, taken by the Director, on a lease of five years, at the trifling rent of 5 shillings per annum.

The works consist of two rolling machines, one for hot and the other for cold metal, worked by four horses, and requiring five hands constantly to attend them while in operation. There is a third, nearly completed, to be appropriated to the purposes of equalizing the strips for cutting the planchottes, and are worked by the same hands as are last mentioned. Three cutting presses for the planchettes of larger and smaller coins, which are worked by one man each. A milling machine, which is intended to be worked by the horse mill, but at present requires one hand. Three coining presses, with the improvement for supplying and discharging themselves by machinery. Six hands will attend three if in one room. A fourth, for dollars and medals in particular, will be finished in about three months. Two turning lathes for dies, and a boring machine for making holes in the large frames, screws for presses, stakes, rollers, and an infinite variety of instruments and tools necessary to carry on the coining.

There are, besides, three annealing and one boiling furnace, with two forges, the assay, melting, and refining furnaces.

The net produce of these works, from the establishment of the Mint to this time, consists of 1,087,500 cents, paid into the Treasury of the United States, equal to $10,875; in silver coins delivered, $35,165. The future produce, it is said, will be about two hundred thousand cents per month.

The Treasurer has received, in gross silver bullion, from depositors, 116,788 ounces 18 pennyweights, containing alloy, below the standard of the United States, of 24,578 ounces, 7 pennyweights.

Your committee have made a strict inquiry into the causes why the product has not been greater in so long a time as two years and a half from its institution, and find that, in general, the difficulties attending all establishments that are, in their formation and operation, new and uncommon, and which, therefore, require experiments to be made in every step of their progress, have attended this institution. No works of this kind, requiring equal force and equal precision, ever having been made in this country, workmen, those expected to be obtained from Europe, by some means having failed in the different branches, were hard to be got, and many, when engaged, were not masters of their business; the materials were difficult to be obtained; and often proved insufficient for the force required; even bar iron, from the large size required, as well as the castings, caused great delay before they could be had. Oftentimes, when the machinery was finished and set to work, it gave way, and all was to be done over again. All the tools necessary to make the machines were first to be made themselves. Not only the whole machinery, in all its parts, but all the tools necessary for their formation, have been executed at the Mint. This could not be effected by an union of all the proper artisans, each a complete workman in his own department, but, from necessity, was confined to the principal officer of the coining department, who could only proceed from theoretic principles, with the assistance of such workmen as could be procured, to whom most of the machines, however common in Europe, were entirely new. Add to this, that mere theoretic knowledge has produced greater complexity in the system, and of course greater delay and expense, than full practical knowledge would have found necessary.

The Mints in Europe have been gradual in their improvements, and have been of many years' standing. This has had every difficulty to struggle with, and was to be brought to perfection at once, lest our coins should not bear a comparison with those of other nations. Those lately executed are superior to any made in Europe.

The buildings were all to be completed before the works could be begun. The lots on which the same are built, from a principle of economy, were so restricted in size that they are now found to be much too small, and so insufficient as greatly to hinder the several operations and delay the business. It was also a considerable time before an engraver could be engaged, during which the Chief Coiner was obliged to make the dies for himself, and yet the dies are subject to frequent failures by breaking. Great delays have also taken place for want of a Refiner and Melter, provision for such an office having been wholly omitted in the law instituting the Mint, by which the present stock of copper remains useless and unproductive.

Your committee have been convinced by these facts, as well as from actual observation, that there are substantial reasons exculpatory of the officers of the Mint for the delay attending this undertaking; but they are happy in observing that most of these difficulties are now surmounted, and the future product of the coinage must be very considerable.

3. The expenses attending the institution has been very great, from the necessity and difficulties above alluded to.

It amounted, on the 30th day of September last, to the following sums, including the standing capital, and copper to be coined into money—

Lands purchased	$4,266 66
Buildings, apparatus, machines, &c.	22,720 45
Purchase of copper	15,815 51
Salaries to officers	15,591 99
	$58,394 61

4. The improvements yet necessary.

It would be a very important saving to the public, as well as add great expedition to every part of the machinery, if they could be put in motion by water or steam, instead of manual labor or that of horses. At present water is out of the question, without removing the works out of the city, to which there are many solid objections; but in case the projected canal between the Schuylkill and Delaware should be accomplished, the heavy expense of this institution would be greatly reduced.

It has already been mentioned, as one cause of delay, the omission in the law of provision for a Refiner and Melter, whose duty it should be to take charge of all metals delivered out by the Treasurer, after they have been assayed and refined, and melt them into bars and ingots fit for the rolling machine, when they are to be delivered over to the Chief Coiner. This is a necessary and essential improvement. The law originally contemplated the Assayer as the only officer necessary in this part of the business.

In the European Mints, all metals deposited for coining, are first brought to the proper standard at the expense of the owner, and by private professional workmen established in that country, independent of the Mint, and therefore no such officer belongs to those institutions; but, in this country, for want of such a private establishment, it becomes a necessary department of the Mint. And although your committee are of opinion that the Assayer might, in point of labor, execute this office, his time not being wholly taken up in his proper department, yet the propriety of positive checks throughout the whole of the business of the Mint, absolutely forbids it. Such an officer must, therefore, be appointed, or the former delays will necessarily accrue. Those would have been greater than they have been had not the Director employed an occasional workman to assist in that part of the operation.

As it is the practice, in all the Mints of Europe, for the owners of bullion to have it refined to the legal standard at their own expense, your committee are of opinion that a reasonable sum from every deposit should be retained by the Treasurer of the Mint as a compensation for refining and melting. This will appear the more reasonable when it is known that the bullion already lodged in the Mint has cost the United States at least $500 for refining.

Your committee further find that the standard fineness of silver directed by law, in the opinion of the officers of the Mint, contains too great an alloy, and will expose the coin to wear black, and, therefore, that the alloy should be reduced.

The English standard of silver coin is 11 ounces, 2 pennyweights of pure silver in the pound Troy. Spanish coins ought to contain 10 ounces, 15 pennyweights.

French crowns, of the late Government, 10 ounces 174 pennyweights.

A mean of both is 10 ounces 161 pennyweights. One-tenth part alloy, which is the standard of the present Government of France, established as a mean between both, leaves 10 ounces 16 pennyweights.

But the standard of the United States is 10 ounces 14 pennyweights, and 19.104 parts. This extreme fractional part of our standard for silver produces great inconvenience, without any advantage, that your committee could discover; and they are, therefore, of the opinion that the mean of 10 ounces 16 pennyweights should be adopted. It has also appeared to your committee that the price of copper is very fluctuating, and may so increase, as, in some degree, it has done since the law for ascertaining the weight of cents, that, when coined and issued, coppercents may work them up to considerable advantage. To prevent this growing evil provision should be made, by law, in time to check it. Great complaints are made throughout the United States of the difficulty of obtaining cents when coined. The practice, hitherto, in pursuance of the requisition of the law, has been for the Treasurer of the Mint to pay them over to the Treasurer of the United States, who distributes them among the Banks in this city. This will produce a supply, in time, for the States in the neighborhood of the Mint, but will not give satisfaction to the distant parts of the Union, who pay their equal share of the expense.

Your committee, therefore, are of opinion that it would be a valuable improvement to make provision, by law, for a more general distribution of the cents as they are coined.

5. The Stock of Metals.

Now on hand, uncoined, amounts to upwards of fifteen tons of copper, most of which requires refining, and the whole melting into ingots, preparative to rolling. There also yet remains about 35,507 ounces of silver bullion deposited for coining, which must also go through the hands of the Refiner and Melter before it can be coined; and large quantities are ready to be brought when the Mint is ready for the receipt of it.

6. The produce of the Works when complete.

The rolling machines, for large coins, will roll from twelve to fifteen thousand ounces per day; that for small coin about half that quantity.

The drawing machine, for strips, can execute, daily the produce of one rolling machine.

The three cutting presses will each cut from fifteen to eighteen thousand planchettes per day, and the milling machine will also pass them through at the same time, when worked by horses; but, in the present state, will mill about ten thousand.

The three coining presses, when complete, will strike from eight to twelve thousand of the smaller kinds of coin per day; so that, on an average, ten thousand cents, equal to one hundred dollars, may be coined in a day by each press, if all are worked.

7. The Accounts of the Mint.

These are kept by the Treasurer, according to the directions, and in the manner pointed out by the Secretary of the Treasury, and appear to your committee to be fully checked for the security of the public against every avenue of deception.

All moneys appropriated for the use of the Mint, and advanced by the Treasury of the United States, are granted in the name of the Treasurer of the Mint, on warrants from the President of the United States on the Secretary of the Treasury, and from him in favor of the Treasurer of the Mint, and are deposited in the Bank of the United States, to the credit of the Treasurer of the Mint, in a separate account.

He receives all claims upon the Mint, in the first instance, and gives them his approbation before they can pass. These are under the heads of Salaries to officers and clerks.

Wages of laborers.

Incidental and contingent expenses.

Copper purchased for coining.

The account is then presented to the Director, who examines the same, and issues his warrant on the Treasurer of the Mint for payment. These accounts are rendered quarterly by the Treasurer to the Treasury, where they are subject to their final decision, as well respecting the ordinary expenses of the Mint, as the accounts of bullion and coinage.

The bullion is received by the Treasurer of the Mint, in the first instance, who gives receipts therefor, dated and numbered, progressively, distinguishing, by a different series, those given for silver from those for gold.

These receipts are entered in a register containing two accounts, one for each of the precious metals.

All bullion is inspected by the Assayer, and a few grains of every parcel given him to be assayed, and his certificate of the pure gold or silver in each deposit is returned, to be entered in the register; the Treasurer then computes the value of the deposit in coin of the United States, which is entered in the register.

The bullion is then delivered to the Chief Coiner, on the warrant of the Director, to the Treasurer of the Mint, who takes his receipt thereon. When coined, the Chief Coiner pays them over, on a like warrant, to the Treasurer of the Mint, and he again to the Treasurer of the United States, on a warrant from the Secretary of the Treasury.

By this system, established by the Treasury Department, all bullion is to be lodged in the vaults of the Mint, and secured under two locks, the keys of which are kept by the Treasurer and Assayer.

When bullion is in the custody of the Chief Coiner, it is to be constantly subject to the inspection of the Assayer, he being responsible for the standard purity of the respective coins; and, when the bullion is not in use, it is to be kept under two locks, the keys of which are to be kept by the Assayer and Chief Coiner.

From every mass of coins, the Treasurer takes three pieces, in the presence of the Assayer, which are secured by him under cover, with seal of the Assayer thereon, for the purpose mentioned in the law.

All coins made on account of individuals are paid by the Treasurer, on the warrant of the Director.

In addition to these checks, all receipts of bullion and delivery of coins are entered into a regular set of books, kept for that purpose.

All the forms of the documents requisite for common use are printed, bound, and issued under indented checks, for the greater public security.

Your committee having thus given a concise state of the Mint, beg leave to recommend the following resolutions:

1. Resolved, That provision ought to be made, by law, for the appointment of a Refiner and Melter in the Mint of the United States, whose duty it shall be to take charge of all copper, and silver, and gold bullion, delivered out by the Treasurer of the Mint, after it has been assayed, and reduce it into bars or ingots for the rolling mills, and then to deliver them to the Chief Coiner or Treasurer, as the Director shall judge expedient, and to do and perform all other duties belonging to the office of Refiner and Melter, or which shall be ordered by the Director of the Mint.

2. Resolved, That provision ought to be made, by law, authorizing the Treasurer of the Mint to retain two cents per ounce from every deposit of silver bullion below standard, and four cents per ounce for every deposit of gold bullion below the standard, unless the same shall require the operation of the test, then six cents as a compensation for refining and making the same.

3. Resolved, That the gross bullion brought for deposit and coinage to the Mint, shall not be received in smaller quantities than two hundred ounces of silver, and twenty ounces of gold.

4. Resolved, That the standard for silver coin, as now established by law, be altered, and made to consist of nine equal ten parts of pure silver, and one-tenth part of pure copper, being equal to ten pounds sixteen pennyweights of pure silver in one pound Troy.

5. Resolved, That the President of the United States be authorized to reduce the weight of the copper coin at his discretion: Provided, Such reduction shall not exceed two pennyweights in each cent, and in proportion in each half cent, of which he shall give notice, by proclamation, and report the same to the next session of Congress.

6. Resolved, That the Treasurer of the United States be authorized, by law, to distribute, at the public expense, all cents received from the Treasurer of the Mint, by sending them to some one Bank in each State, where any are established, and, where not, to the principal Collector of such State, in proportion to the number of inhabitants of the State, to be by them paid out, for cash, to any person requesting the same, in sums not less than ten dollars value.

7. Resolved, That provision ought to be made, by law, enabling the Director and Treasurer of the Mint to give a preference to bullion brought to the Mint, already of or above the standard of the United States, so as not to be prevented coining, and issuing the same, although bullion below the standard, and not yet refined, may have been deposited for coinage before it; any thing in any law heretofore passed to the contrary notwithstanding.

By THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,

A PROCLAMATION.

Whereas I have received information that certain persons in violation of the laws have presumed, under color of a foreign authority, to enlist citizens of the United States and others within the State of Kentucky, and have there assembled an armed force for the purpose of invading and plundering the Territories of a nation at peace with the said United States: And whereas such unwarrantable measures, being contrary to the laws of nations and to the duties incumbent on every citizen of the United States, tend to disturb the tranquility of the same, and to involve them in the calamities of war: And whereas it is the duty of the Executive to take care that such criminal proceedings should be suppressed, the offenders brought to justice, and all good citizens cautioned against measures likely to prove so pernicious to their country and themselves, should they be seduced into similar infractions of the laws;

I have, therefore, thought proper to issue this Proclamation hereby solemnly warning every person not authorized by the laws, against enlisting any citizen or citizens of the United States, or levying troops, or assembling any persons within the United States, for the purposes aforesaid, or proceeding in any manner to the execution thereof, as they will answer the same at their peril; and I do also admonish and require all citizens to refrain from enlisting, enrolling, or assembling themselves for such unlawful purposes, and from being in any wise concerned, aiding, or abetting therein, as they tender their own welfare, inasmuch as all lawful means will be strictly put in execution for securing obedience to the laws, and for punishing such dangerous and daring violations thereof;

Proclamation by the President.

And I do moreover charge and require all Courts, magistrates, and other officers, whom it may concern, according to their respective duties, to exert the powers in them severally vested to prevent and suppress all such unlawful assemblages and proceedings, and to bring to condign punishment those who may have been guilty thereof, as they regard the due authority of Government, and the peace and welfare of the United States.

In testimony whereof, I have caused the seal of the United States of America to be affixed to these presents, and signed the same with my hand. Done at the city of Philadelphia, the twenty-fourth day of March, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-four, and of the Independence of the United States of America, the eighteenth.

G. WASHINGTON.
By the President: EDM. RANDOLPH.

By THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,

A PROCLAMATION

Whereas combinations to defeat the execution of the laws laying duties upon spirits distilled within the United States, and upon stills, have from the time of the commencement of those laws existed in some of the Western parts of Pennsylvania; And whereas the said combinations, proceeding in a manner subversive equally of the just authority of Government and of the rights of individuals, have hitherto effected their dangerous and criminal purpose; by the influence of certain irregular meetings whose proceedings have tended to encourage and uphold the spirit of opposition; by misrepresentations of the law, calculated to render them odious; by endeavors to deter those who might be so disposed from accepting offices under them, through fear of public resentment and of injury to person and property, and to compel those who had accepted such offices, by actual violence to surrender or forbear the execution of them; by circulating vindictive menaces against all those who should otherwise directly or indirectly aid in the execution of the said laws, or who, yielding to the dictates of conscience, and to a sense of obligation, should themselves comply therewith, by actually injuring and destroying the property of persons who were understood to have so complied; by inflicting cruel and humiliating punishments upon private citizens, for no other cause than that of appearing to be the friends of the laws; by intercepting the public officers on the highways, abusing, assaulting, and otherwise ill treating them; by going to their houses in the night, gaining admittance by force, taking away their papers, and committing other outrages; employing for these unwarrantable purposes the agency of armed banditti disguised in such manner as for the most part to escape discovery: And whereas the endeavors of the Legislature to obviate objections to the said laws, by lowering the duties and by other alterations conducive to the convenience of those whom they immediately affect, (though they have given satisfaction in other quarters,) and the endeavors of the executive officers to conciliate a compliance with the laws, by explanations, by forbearance, and even by particular accommodations, founded on the suggestions of local considerations, have been disappointed of their effect by the machinations of persons whose industry to excite resistance has increased with every appearance of a disposition among the people to relax in their opposition and to acquiesce in the laws, inasmuch that many persons in the said Western parts of Pennsylvania have at length been hardy enough to perpetrate acts which I am advised amount to treason, being overt acts of levying war against the United States; the said persons having on the sixteenth and seventeenth of July last past proceeded in arms (on the second day, amounting to several hundreds) to the house of John Neville, inspector of the revenue for the fourth survey of the district of Pennsylvania, having repeatedly attacked the said house with the persons therein, wounding some of them; having seized David Lenox, marshal of the district of Pennsylvania, who, previous thereto, had been fired upon while in the execution of his duty, by a party of armed men, detaining him for some time prisoner, till, for the preservation of his life and the obtaining of his liberty, he found it necessary to enter into stipulations to forbear the execution of certain official duties touching processes issuing out of a Court of the United States; and having finally obliged the said inspector of the revenue, and the said marshal, from considerations of personal safety, to fly from that part of the country, in order, by a circuitous route, to proceed to the seat of Government; avowing as the motives for these outrageous proceedings an intention to prevent by force of arms the execution of the said laws, to oblige the said inspector of the revenue to renounce his said office, to withstand by open violence the lawful authority of Government of the United States, and to compel thereby an alteration in the measures of the Legislature and a repeal of the laws aforesaid.

And whereas, by a law of the United States, entitled "An act to provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions," it is enacted "that whenever the laws of the United States shall be opposed or the execution thereof obstructed in any State by combinations too powerful to be suppressed by the ordinary course of judicial proceedings, or by the powers vested in the marshals by that Act, the same being notified by an Associate Justice or District Judge, it shall be lawful for the President of the United States to call forth the militia of such State to suppress such combinations, and to cause the laws to be duly executed. And if the militia of a State where such combinations may happen shall refuse, or be insufficient to suppress the same, it shall be lawful for the President, if the Legislature of the United States shall not be in session, to call forth and employ such numbers of the militia of any other State or States, most convenient thereto, as may be necessary; and the use of the militia so to be called forth may be continued, if necessary, until the expiration of thirty days after the commencement of the ensuing session: Provided, always, That whenever it may be necessary, in the judgment of the President, to use the military force hereby directed to be called forth, the President shall forthwith, and previous thereto, by proclamation, command such insurgents to disperse and retire peaceably to their respective abodes within a limited time."

Proclamation by the President.

And whereas James Wilson, an Associate Justice, on the fourth instant, by writing under his hand, did, from evidence which had been laid before him, notify to me that "in the counties of Washington and Alleghany, in Pennsylvania, laws of the United States are opposed, and the execution thereof obstructed by combinations too powerful to be suppressed by the ordinary course of judicial proceedings, or by the powers vested in the marshal of that district."

And whereas it is, in my judgment, necessary, under the circumstances of the case, to take measures for calling forth the militia, in order to suppress the combinations aforesaid, and to cause the laws to be duly executed, and I have accordingly determined to do so, feeling the deepest regret for the occasion, but without the most solemn conviction that the essential interests of the Union demand it—that the very existence of Government, and the fundamental principles of social order, are materially involved in the issue, and that the patriotism and firmness of all good citizens are seriously called upon, as occasion may require, to aid in the effectual suppression of so fatal a spirit.

Wherefore, and in pursuance of the proviso above recited, I, GEORGE WASHINGTON, President of the United States, do hereby command all persons, being insurgents as aforesaid, and all others whom it may concern, on or before the first day of September next, to disperse and retire peaceably to their respective abodes. And I do moreover warn all persons whomsoever against aiding, abetting, or comforting the perpetrators of the aforesaid treasonable acts; and do require all officers and other citizens, according to their respective duties and the laws of the land, to exert their utmost endeavors to prevent and suppress such dangerous proceedings.

In testimony whereof, I have caused the seal of the United States of America to be affixed to these presents, and signed the same with my hand. Done at the city of Philadelphia, the seventh day of August, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-four, and of the Independence of the United States of America the nineteenth.

By THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,

A PROCLAMATION.

Whereas, from a hope that the combinations against the Constitution and laws of the United States, in certain of the Western counties of Pennsylvania, would yield to time and reflection, I thought it sufficient, in the first instance, rather to take measures for calling forth the militia than immediately to embody them; but the moment is now come, when the overtures of forgiveness, with no other condition than a submission to law, have been only partially accepted; when every form of conciliation not inconsistent with the being of Government has been adopted, without effect; when the well-disposed in those counties are unable by their influence and example to reclaim the wicked from their fury, and are compelled to associate in their own defence; when the proffered lenity has been perversely misinterpreted into an apprehension that the citizens will march with reluctance; when the opportunity of examining the serious consequences of a treasonable opposition has been employed in propagating principles of anarchy, endeavoring through emissaries to alienate the friends of order from its support, and inviting enemies to perpetrate similar acts of insurrection; when it is manifest that violence would continue to be exercised, upon every attempt to enforce the laws; when, therefore, Government is set at defiance, the contest being whether a small portion of the United States shall dictate to the whole Union, and, at the expense of those who desire peace, indulge a desperate ambition:

Now, therefore, I, GEORGE WASHINGTON, President of the United States, in obedience to that high and irresistible duty, consigned to me by the Constitution, "to take care that the laws be faithfully executed"—deploring that the American name should be sullied by the outrages of citizens, as remain obstinate from delusion; but resolved, in perfect reliance on that gracious Providence which so signally displays its goodness towards this country, to reduce the refractory to a due subordination to the law—do hereby declare and make known, that, with a satisfaction which can be equalled only by the merits of the militia summoned into service from the States of New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Maryland, and Virginia, I have received intelligence of their patriotic alacrity, in obeying the call of the present, though painful, yet commanding necessity; that a force, which, according to every reasonable expectation, is adequate to the exigency, is already in motion to the scene of disaffection; that those who have confided, or shall confide in the protection of Government, shall meet full succor under the standard and from the arms of the United States; that those who having offended against the laws have since entitled themselves to indemnity, will be treated with the most liberal good faith, if they shall not have forfeited their claim by any subsequent conduct, and that instructions are given accordingly.

And I do, moreover, exhort all individuals, officers, and bodies of men, to contemplate with abhorrence the measures leading directly or indirectly to those crimes, which produce this resort to military coercion; to check, in their respective spheres, the efforts of misguided or designing men, to substitute their misrepresentation in the place of truth, and their discontents in the place of stable government; and to call to mind, that as the people of the United States have been permitted, under the Divine favor, in perfect freedom, after solemn deliberation, and in an enlightened age, to elect their own Government, so will their gratitude for this inestimable blessing be best distinguished by firm exertions to maintain the Constitution and the laws.

Proclamation by the President.

And, lastly, I again warn all persons, whomsoever and wheresoever, not to abet, aid, or comfort the insurgents aforesaid, as they will answer the contrary at their peril; and I do also require all officers and other citizens, according to their several duties, as far as may be in their power, to bring under the cognizance of the law all offenders in the premises.

In testimony whereof, I have caused the seal of the United States of America to be affixed to these presents, and signed the same with my hand.

BY THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,

A PROCLAMATION.

When we review the calamities which afflict so many other nations, the present condition of the United States affords much matter of consolation and satisfaction. Our exemption hitherto from foreign war, an increasing prospect of the continuance of that exemption, the great degree of internal tranquility we have enjoyed, the recent confirmation of that tranquility by the suppression of an insurrection which so wantonly threatened it, the happy course of our public affairs in general, the unexampled prosperity of all classes of our citizens—are circumstances which peculiarly mark our situation with indications of the Divine beneficence towards us. In such a state of things it is, in an especial manner, our duty as a people, with devout reverence and affectionate gratitude, to acknowledge our many and great obligations to Almighty God, and to implore him to continue and confirm the blessings we experience.

Deeply penetrated with this sentiment, I, Grose Washington, President of the United States, do recommend to all religious societies and denominations, and to all persons whomsoever, within the United States, to set apart and observe Thursday, the nineteenth day of February next, as a Day of Public Thanksgiving and Prayer; and on that day to meet together and render their sincere and hearty thanks to the Great Ruler of Nations for the manifold and signal mercies which distinguish our lot as a nation; particularly for the possession of Constitutions of Government which unite, and, by their union, establish liberty with order; for the preservation of our peace, foreign and domestic; for the seasonable control which has been given to a spirit of disorder, in the suppression of the late insurrection; and generally, for the prosperous course of our affairs, public and private; and, at the same time, humbly and fervently to beseech the kind Author of these blessings graciously to prolong them to us—to imprint on our hearts a deep and solemn sense of our obligations to him for them—to teach us rightly to estimate their immense value—to preserve us from the arrogance of prosperity, and from hazarding the advantages we enjoy by delusive pursuits—to dispose us to merit the continuance of his favors, by not abusing them, by our gratitude for them, and by a correspondent conduct as citizens and as men—to render this country more and more a safe and propitious asylum for the unfortunate of other countries—to extend among us true and useful knowledge—to diffuse and establish habits of sobriety, order, morality, and piety; and, finally to impart all the blessings we possess, or ask for ourselves, to the whole family of mankind.

In testimony whereof, I have caused the seal of the United States of America to be affixed to these presents, and signed the same with my hand.

Done at the city of Philadelphia, the first day of January, 1795, and of the Independence of the United States of America the nineteenth.

PUBLIC ACTS OF CONGRESS;

PASSED AT THE FIRST SESSION OF THE THIRD CONGRESS, BEGUN AND HELD AT PHILADELPHIA, ON THE SECOND OF DECEMBER 1793.

An Act making an alteration in the Flag of the United States.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That, from and after the first day of May, Anno Domini one thousand seven hundred and ninety-five, the Flag of the United States be fifteen stripes alternate red and white. That the Union be fifteen stars, white, in a blue field.

FREDERICK A. MUHLENBERG,

Speaker of the House of Representatives.

JOHN ADAMS,

Vice President of the United States, and President of the Senate.

Approved, January 13, 1794.

GEO. WASHINGTON,

President of the United States.

verment of the United States and the said Republic: Provided, however, That, unless the French Republic or its Minister, or other authorized agent, shall, within six months from the passing of this act, expressly authorize a charge to the debit of the said Republic of the said supplies which shall have been, or may be made under this act, all further supplies under the same shall, from and after the expiration of the said term of six months, be discontinued.

Approved, February 12, 1794.

An Act in alteration of the act establishing a Mint and regulating the Coins of the United States.

Be it enacted, &c., That, from and after the passing this act, it shall be the duty of the Treasurer of the Mint to receive and give receipts for all metals which may lawfully be brought to the Mint to be coined; and, for the purpose of ascertaining their respective qualities, shall deliver from every parcel so received, a sufficient number of grains to the Assayer, who shall assay all such of them as may require it. And the said Treasurer shall, from time to time, deliver the said metals to the Chief Coiner to be coined in such quantities as the Director of the Mint may prescribe.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the Assayer and Chief Coiner of the Mint, previous to entering upon the execution of their respective offices, shall each become bound to the United States of America, with one or more sureties, to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Treasury, the said Assayer in the sum of one thousand dollars, and the said Chief Coiner, in the sum of five thousand dollars, with condition for the faithful and diligent performance of the duties of his office.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That so much of the act, entitled "An act establishing a Mint and regulating the coins of the United States," as comes within the purview of this act, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

Approved, March 3, 1794.

An Act for the remission of the duties arising on the tonnage of sundry French vessels which have taken refuge in the ports of the United States.

For repairs, and articles directed to be made and purchased by the President of the United States, two hundred and two thousand seven hundred and eighty-three dollars and thirty-four cents.

For invalid pensioners, eighty thousand two hundred and thirty-nine dollars and fifty-five cents.

For fortifying certain ports and harbors of the United States, and purchasing the lands necessary for the erection of the same, seventy-six thousand dollars.

For the purchase of cannon, implements, and shot, ninety-six thousand dollars.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the several appropriations hereinbefore made shall be paid and discharged out of the funds following, to wit: first, the surplus of the sum of six hundred thousand dollars, reserved by the act "making provision for the Debt of the United States," and which will accrue during the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-four; secondly, the surplus of revenue and income beyond the appropriations heretofore charged thereupon, to the end of the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-four; and, thirdly, the surplus which may remain unexpended of the moneys appropriated for the use of the War Department, in the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-three.

Approved, March 21, 1794.

An Act to prohibit the carrying on the slave trade from the United States to any foreign place or country.

Be it enacted, &c., That no citizen or citizens of the United States, or foreigner, or any other person, coming into, or residing within, the same, shall, for himself, or any other person whatsoever, either as master, factor, or owner, build, fit, equip, load, or otherwise prepare, any ship or vessel, within any port or place of the said United States, nor shall cause any ship or vessel to sail from any port or place within the same, for the purpose of carrying on any trade or traffic in slaves to any foreign country; or for the purpose of procuring inhabitants of such kingdom, place, or country, to be transported to any foreign country, port, or place whatever, to be sold or disposed of as slaves. And if any ship or vessel shall be so fitted out as aforesaid, for the said purposes, or shall be caused to sail, as aforesaid, every such ship or vessel, her tackle, furniture, apparel, and other appurtenances, shall be liable to be seized, prosecuted, and condemned, in any of the Circuit Courts or District Court for the District where the said ship or vessel may be found and seized.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That all and every person, so building, fitting out, equipping, loading, or otherwise preparing, or sending away, any ship or vessel, knowing or intending that the same shall be employed in such trade or business, contrary to the true intent and meaning of this act, or any ways aiding or abetting therein, shall severally forfeit and pay the sum of two thousand dollars—one moiety thereof to the use of the United States, and the other moiety thereof to the use of him or her who shall sue for and prosecute the same.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the owner, master, or factor of each and every foreign ship or vessel, clearing out for any of the coasts or Kingdoms of Africa, or suspected to be intended for the slave trade, and the suspicion being declared to the officer of the customs, by any citizen, on oath or affirmation, and such information being to the satisfaction of the said officer, shall first give bond, with sufficient sureties, to the Treasurer of the United States, that none of the natives of Africa, or any other foreign country or place, shall be taken on board the said ship or vessel, to be transported or sold as slaves, in any other foreign port or place whatever, within nine months thereafter.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That, if any citizen or citizens of the United States shall, contrary to the true intent and meaning of this act, take on board, receive, or transport, any such persons as above described in this act, for the purpose of selling them as slaves, as aforesaid, he or they shall forfeit and pay, for each and every person so received on board, transported, or sold, as aforesaid, the sum of two hundred dollars, to be recovered in any Court of the United States, proper to try the same—the one moiety thereof to the use of the United States, and the other moiety to the use of such person or persons who shall sue for and prosecute the same.

Approved, March 22, 1794.

An Act to provide a Naval Armament.

Whereas, the depredations committed by the Algerine corsairs on the commerce of the United States render it necessary that a Naval Force should be provided for its protection:

Sec. 1. Be it therefore enacted, &c., That the President of the United States be authorized to provide by purchase, or otherwise equip and employ, four ships to carry forty-four guns each, and two ships to carry thirty-six guns each.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That there shall be employed on board each of the said ships of forty-four guns, one captain, four lieutenants, one lieutenant of marines, one chaplain, one surgeon, and two surgeon's mates; and in each of the ships of thirty-six guns, one captain, three lieutenants, one lieutenant of marines, one surgeon, and one surgeon's mate, who shall be appointed and commissioned in like manner as other officers of the United States are.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That there shall be employed in each of the said ships, the following warrant officers, who shall be appointed by the President of the United States, to wit: one sailing-master, one purser, one boatswain, one gunner, one sailmaker, one carpenter, and eight midshipmen; and the following petty officers, who shall be appointed by the captains of the ships respectively, in which they are to be employed, viz: two master's mates, one captain's clerk, two boatswain's mates, one coxswain, one sail-maker's mate, two gunner's mates, one yeoman of the gun room, nine quarter gunners (and for the four larger ships) two additional quarter-gunners, two carpenter's mates, one armorer, one steward, one cooper, one master-at-arms, and one cook.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That the crews of each of the said ships of forty-four guns shall consist of one hundred and fifty-seamen, one hundred and three midshipmen and ordinary seamen, one sergeant, one corporal, one drum, one fife, and fifty marines: And that the crews of each of the said ships of thirty-six guns shall consist of one hundred and thirty able seamen and midshipmen, ninety ordinary seamen, one sergeant, two corporals, one drum, one fife, and forty marines, over and above the officers herein before mentioned.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby empowered, to provide by purchase or otherwise, in lieu of the said six ships, a naval force, not exceeding in the whole, that by this act directed, so that no ship thus provided shall carry less than thirty-two guns; or he may so provide any proportion thereof, which, in his discretion, he may think proper.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That the pay and subsistence of the respective commissioned and warrant officers, be, as follows: A captain, seventy-five dollars per month, and six rations per day; a lieutenant, forty dollars per month, and three rations per day; a lieutenant of marines, twenty-six dollars per month, and two rations per day; a chaplain, forty dollars per month, and two rations per day; a sailing-master, forty dollars per month, and two rations per day; a surgeon, fifty dollars per month, and two rations per day; a surgeon's mate, thirty dollars per month, and two rations per day; a purser, forty dollars per month, and two rations per day; a boatswain, fourteen dollars per month, and two rations per day; a gunner, fourteen dollars per month, and two rations per day; a sail-maker, fourteen dollars per month, and two rations per day; a carpenter, fourteen dollars per month, and two rations per day.

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That the pay to be allowed to the petty officers, midshipmen, seamen, ordinary seamen, and marines, shall be fixed by the President of the United States: Provided, That the whole sum to be given for the whole pay aforesaid, shall not exceed twenty-seven thousand dollars per month, and that each of the said persons shall be entitled to one ration per day.

Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That the ration shall consist of, as follows: Sunday, one pound of bread, one pound and a half of beef, and half a pint of rice: Monday, one pound of bread, one pound of pork, half a pint of peas or beans, and four ounces of cheese: Tuesday, one pound of bread, one pound and a half of beef, and one pound of potatoes or turnips, and pudding: Wednesday, one pound of bread, two ounces of butter, or, in lieu thereof, six ounces of molasses, four ounces of cheese, and half a pint of rice: Thursday, one pound of bread, one pound of pork, and half a pint of peas or beans: Friday, one pound of bread, one pound of salt fish, two ounces of butter, or one gill of oil, and one pound of potatoes: Saturday, one pound of bread, one pound of pork, half a pint of peas or beans, and four ounces of cheese. And there shall also be allowed one half pint of distilled spirits per day, or, in lieu thereof, one quart of beer per day to each ration.

Sec. 9. Provided always, and be it further enacted, That if a peace shall take place between the United States and the Regency of Algiers, that no further proceedings be had under this act.

Approved, March 27, 1794.

An Act allowing to Major General Lafayette his Pay, and Emoluments, while in the service of the United States.

Be it enacted, &c., That there be allowed to Major General Lafayette the sum of twenty-four thousand four hundred and twenty-four dollars, being the amount of the pay and emoluments of a Major General during the time he was in the service of the United States, and that the same be paid out of any moneys which may be in the Treasury, and not otherwise appropriated.

Approved March 27, 1794.

An Act to provide for the Erecting and Repairing of Armories and Magazines, and for other purposes.

Sec. 1. Be it enacted &c., That, for the safe keeping of the military stores there shall be established, under the direction of the President of the United States, three or four Armories with magazines, as he shall judge most expedient, in such places as will best accommodate the different parts of the United States. Either or both of the Armories heretofore used at Springfield and Carlisle, to be continued as part of the said number, at his discretion: Provided, That none of the said Armories be erected until purchases of the land necessary for their accommodation be made, with consent of the Legislature of the State in which the same is intended to be erected.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That there shall be established at each of the aforesaid Armories a National Armory, in which shall be employed one superintendent, and one master-armorer (who shall be appointed by the President of the United States) and as many workmen as the Secretary for the Department of War shall, from time to time, deem necessary, so that the whole number at all the Armories shall not exceed one hundred. And the said superintendents shall each receive as a compensation, seventy dollars per month, and the said master-armorer each, fifty dollars per month.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That there shall be employed an officer, whose duty it shall be (under the direction of the Department of War) to superintend the receiving, safe-keeping, and distribution of the military stores of the United States, and to call to account all persons to whom the same may be entrusted; he shall receive, for his compensation, at the rate of one hundred and twenty-five dollars per month, and shall be appointed by the President of the United States.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That a sum not exceeding fifty-nine thousand dollars be appropriated for the erecting and repairing of the Armories and Magazines aforesaid, and a sum not exceeding twenty-two thousand eight hundred and sixty-five dollars, for defraying the expense of the National Armories for one year; and the further sum of three hundred and forty thousand dollars to be applied under the direction of the President of the United States, in the purchase of arms, ammunition, and military stores; which said several sums shall be paid out of the duties on imports and tonnage, to the end of the present year.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That an annual account of the expenses of the National Armories be laid before the Legislature of the United States, together with an account of the arms made and repaired therein.

Approved, April 2, 1794.

An Act transferring, for a limited time, the Jurisdiction of Suits and Offences from the District to the Circuit Court of New Hampshire, and assigning certain duties in respect to Invalid Pensioners, to the Attorney of said District.

Sec. 1. Be it enacted, &c., That all actions commenced, or pending, in the District Court of New Hampshire, be removed to the next Circuit Court to be holden in that District, there to be tried and determined, in the same manner, as if the cognizance of such actions had been originally given to the said Circuit Court: And the said Circuit Court is hereby vested with the cognizance of all actions, crimes, and offences, by the laws now in force, cognizable in the said District Court, and with all the powers and authorities of the said District Court; and any Judge of the Supreme Court of the United States is authorized to do and perform all the duties, by any law of the United States enjoined upon the said District Judge, except as is hereinafter provided; the fees to be the same as in the District Court, in all such cases.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the duties enjoined the District Judges, by the act "to regulate the claims to invalid pensions," be, and the same are hereby transferred, as far as relates to the District of New Hampshire, to the Attorney of the said District, whose duty it shall be to perform the same.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That this act shall continue in force until the end of the next session of Congress, or until a new District Judge be appointed in that District, and no longer.

Approved, April 3, 1794.

An Act to authorize the President of the United States in certain cases, to alter the place for holding a session of Congress.

Be it enacted, &c., That, whenever the Congress shall be about to convene, and, from the prevalence of contagious sickness, or the existence of other circumstances, it would, in the opinion of the President of the United States, be hazardous to the lives or health of the members to meet at the place to which the Congress shall then stand adjourned, or at which it shall be next by law to meet, the President shall be, and he hereby is authorized, by proclamation, to convene the Congress at such other place as he may judge proper.

Approved, April 3, 1794.

An Act to provide for placing Buoys on certain rocks off the Harbor of New London, and in Providence River, and other places.

Sec. 1. Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be authorized and directed to cause to be placed Buoys on the rocks called Black Ledge, or Southwest Ledge, Goeben Reef, Bartlett's Reef, and Race Rock, off the harbor of New London, in the State of Connecticut, at an expense not to exceed the sum of twelve hundred dollars; and to cause to be erected a Beacon, and to be placed two Buoys, in the harbor of Portsmouth, in the State of New Hampshire, at an expense not to exceed the sum of three hundred dollars: And, likewise, to cause to be placed in Providence river, in the State of Rhode Island, and in Savannah river, in the State of Georgia, and at the mouth of the same, Buoys, not exceeding ten in number, for each river, and at an expense not to exceed the sum of five hundred dollars for each; the same to be placed in such parts of the said rivers as he may judge most advantageous for the navigation thereof respectively.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That there be appropriated and paid out of the moneys arising from the duties on imports and tonnage, the sum of two thousand five hundred dollars for the purpose aforesaid.

Approved, April 5, 1794.

An Act limiting the time for presenting Claims for destroyed Certificates, of certain descriptions.

Be it enacted, &c., That all claims for the renewal of certificates of the unsubscribed Debt of the United States, of the descriptions commonly called "Loan Office Certificates" or "Final Settlements," which may have been accidentally destroyed, shall be forever barred and precluded from settlement or allowance, unless the same shall be presented at the Treasury, on or before the first day of June, in the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-five.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That no claim shall be allowed for the renewal of Loan Office certificates destroyed before the fourth day of March, one thousand seven hundred and eighty-nine, unless the destruction of the same was advertised, according to the resolution of Congress, of the 10th day of May, one thousand seven hundred and eighty; or, before that time, was notified to the office from which the same was issued, nor shall claims be allowed for the renewal of Loan Office certificates, destroyed on or after the said fourth day of March, one thousand seven hundred and eighty-nine, nor of final settlement certificates, destroyed at any time, unless the destruction of the same was so far made public, as to be known to, at least, two credible witnesses, soon after it happened, and shall have been before the presentation of the claim, as hereinafter provided, advertised for, at least, six weeks successively, in some one of the newspapers of the State in which the destruction happened; and also in some one of the newspapers of the State in which the certificate issued, if that was another State; the advertisement or advertisements, in such case, expressing, with as much precision as possible, the number, date, and amount of the certificate alleged to have been destroyed, and the name of the person to whom the same was issued, together with the time when, the place where, and the means by which, the same was destroyed.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That all claims for the renewal of destroyed certificates, of either of the descriptions aforesaid, not precluded by this act, shall be receivable, with the evidence in support of the same, by the Auditor of the Treasury, until the said first day of June, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-five, and shall, by the accounting officers of the Treasury, be duly examined; and, if satisfactorily supported, the claimants shall be entitled to receive certificates of registered Debt, equal to the specie value of the Loan Office or final settlement certificates so proved to have been destroyed.

Approved, April 21, 1794.

Wheeling to Limestone, the present post-road from Abington to Danville, in Kentucky, shall be continued; and if such provision cannot be made within a reasonable time, then the post-road shall be extended from Danville to Frankfort, and Lexington, and thence to Washington.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for the Postmaster General to provide, by contract, for the carriage of a mail on any road on which a stage-wagon, or other stage-carriage, shall be established, on condition that the expense thereof shall not exceed the revenue thence arising.

It shall also be lawful for the Postmaster General to enter into contracts, for a term not exceeding eight years, for extending the line of posts, and to authorize the persons, so contracting, as a compensation for their expenses, to receive, during the continuance of such contracts, at rates not exceeding those for like distances established by this act, all the postage which shall arise on letters, newspapers, magazines, pamphlets, and packets, conveyed by any such post. And the roads designated in such contracts shall, during the continuance thereof, be deemed and considered as post-roads within the provisions of this act: And a duplicate of every such contract, shall, within sixty days after the execution thereof, be lodged in the office of the Comptroller of the Treasury of the United States.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That there shall be established at the Seat of Government of the United States, a General Post Office; and there shall be one Postmaster General, who shall have authority to appoint an Assistant and Deputy Postmasters at all such places, as he shall find necessary; and he shall provide for carrying the mail of the United States, by stage carriages or horses, as he may judge most expedient; and as often as he, having regard to the productiveness thereof, as well as other circumstances, shall think proper, and defray the expense thereof, with all other expenses arising on the collection and management of the revenue of the Post Office. He shall also have power to prescribe such regulations to the deputy postmasters, and others employed under him, as may be found necessary, and to superintend the business of the Department, in all the duties that are or may be assigned to it, and also to direct the route or road, where there are more than one, between the places above established, which route or road shall be considered as the post-road.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That the Postmaster General shall, once in three months, obtain from his deputies the accounts and vouchers of their receipts and expenditures, and the balance due thereon, and render to the Secretary of the Treasury a quarterly account of all the receipts and expenditures in the said Department, to be adjusted and settled, as other public accounts; and shall pay quarterly into the Treasury of the United States, the balance in his hands; and the Postmaster General, and his assistants, the Deputy Postmasters, and such as they may employ in their offices, before they enter upon their duties, or be entitled to receive the emoluments of their offices, and the contractors for carrying the mail, and their agents or servants, and all others to whom the mail shall be intrusted, before they commence the execution of the said trust, shall, respectively, take and subscribe, before some Justice of the Peace, the following oath or affirmation, and cause a certificate thereof to be filed in the office of the Postmaster General:—"I do swear (or affirm, as the case may be,) that I will faithfully perform all the duties required of me, and abstain from everything forbidden by the law, in relation to the establishment of Post Offices and Post Roads within the United States."

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That if any person should obstruct or retard the passage of the mail, or of any horse or carriage carrying the same, he shall, upon conviction for every such offence, pay a fine of not exceeding one hundred dollars; and if any ferryman shall, by wilful negligence or refusal to transport the mail across any ferry, delay the same, he shall forfeit and pay, for each half hour that the same shall be so delayed, a sum not exceeding ten dollars.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the Postmaster General to give public notice, in one or more of the newspapers published at the Seat of Government of the United States, and in one or more of the newspapers published in the State or States, where the contract is to be performed, for at least six weeks before the entering into any contract for the conveyance of the mail, that such contract is intended to be made, and the day on which it shall be concluded, describing the places from, and to which such mail is to be conveyed; the time at which it is to be made up; the day and hour at which it is to be delivered; and the penalty or penalties for non-performance of the stipulations; he shall, moreover, within thirty days after the making of any contract, lodge the same, together with the proposals, which he shall have received respecting it, in the office of the Comptroller of the Treasury of the United States: Provided, That no contract shall be entered into for a longer term than four years.

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That every Deputy Postmaster shall keep an office, in which one or more persons shall attend, at such hours as the Postmaster General shall direct for the purpose of performing the duties thereof; and all letters, brought to any Post Office half an hour before the time of making up the mail at such office, shall be forwarded therein, except at such Post Offices, where, in the opinion of the Postmaster General, it requires more time for making up the mail, and which he shall accordingly prescribe; but this shall in no case exceed one hour.

Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That, from and after the first day of June next, the Postmaster General shall be allowed, for his services, at the rate of two thousand four hundred dollars per annum, his assistant, at the rate of one thousand two hundred dollars per annum, and the Postmaster General shall be allowed four clerks, whose compensation shall be regulated in such manner as not to exceed five hundred dollars per annum to each: All the above mentioned compensations to be paid quarterly out of the revenues of the Post Office; and no fees or perquisites shall be received by any person employed in the general Post Office, on account of the duties to be performed, in virtue of his appointment.

Sec. 9. And be it further enacted, That the Deputy Postmasters, and persons authorized by the Postmaster General, shall demand and receive for the conveyance of letters and packets, except such as are hereinafter excepted, the following rates of postage: For every single letter conveyed by land, not exceeding thirty miles, six cents; over thirty miles, and not exceeding sixty, eight cents; over sixty, and not exceeding one hundred, ten cents; over one hundred miles, and not exceeding one hundred and fifty, twelve cents and a half; over one hundred and fifty miles, and not exceeding two hundred, fifteen cents; over two hundred miles, and not exceeding two hundred and fifty, seventeen cents; over two hundred and fifty miles, and not exceeding three hundred and fifty, twenty cents; over three hundred and fifty miles, and not exceeding four hundred and fifty, twenty-two cents; and more than four hundred and fifty miles, twenty-five cents; and for every double letter, double the said rates; for every triple letter, triple; and for every packet, weighing one ounce or less, at the rate of four single letters; and in that proportion for any greater weight.

Sec. 10. And be it further enacted, That, for all letters and packets passing by sea to and from the United States, or from one port to another therein, in packet boats or vessels, the property of, or provided by the United States, postage shall be charged as follows: For every single letter, eight cents; for every double letter, sixteen cents; for every triple letter, or packet, twenty-four cents; and for every letter or packet brought into the United States, or carried from one port therein to another, by sea, in any private ship or vessel, four cents, if delivered at the place where the same shall arrive; and if directed to be delivered at any other place, with the addition of like postage, as other letters are made subject to the payment of, by this act.

Sec. 11. And be it further enacted, That if any Deputy Postmaster, or other person authorized by the Postmaster General to receive the postages of letters, shall fraudulently demand or receive any rate of postage, or any gratuity or reward, other than is provided by this act, for the postage of letters or packets, on conviction thereof, he shall forfeit, for every such offence, one hundred dollars, and shall be rendered incapable of holding any office or appointment under the United States.

Sec. 12. And be it further enacted, That no ship or vessel, arriving at any port within the United States, where a Post Office is established, shall be permitted to report, make entry, or break bulk, until the master or commander shall have delivered to the Postmaster, all letters directed to any person or persons, within the United States, which, under his care, or within his power, shall be brought in such ship or vessel, except such as are directed to the owner or consignee of the ship or vessel, and except also such as are directed to be delivered at the port of delivery, to which such ship or vessel may be bound. And it shall be the duty of the Collector, or other officer of the port, empowered to receive entries of ships or vessels, to require from every master or commander of such ship or vessel, an oath or affirmation, purporting that he has delivered all such letters, except as aforesaid.

Sec. 13. And be it further enacted, That the Postmasters, to whom such letters may be delivered, shall pay to the master, commander, or other person, delivering the same, except the commanders of foreign packets, two cents for each letter or packet, and shall obtain from the person delivering the same, a certificate, specifying the number of letters and packets, with the name of the ship or vessel, and the place from whence she last sailed, which certificate, together with a receipt for the money, shall be, with his quarterly accounts, transmitted to the Postmaster General, who shall credit him with the amount.

Sec. 14. And be it further enacted, That if any person, other than the Postmaster General, or his deputies, or persons by them employed, shall be concerned in setting up or maintaining any foot or horse post, stage wagon, or other stage carriage, on any established Post Road, or any packet boat or other vessel, to ply regularly from one place to another, between which a regular communication by water, shall be established by the United States, and shall receive any letter or packet, other than newspapers, magazines, or pamphlets, and carry the same, by such foot or horse post, stage wagon, or other stage carriage, packet boat or vessel, (excepting only such letter or letters, as may be directed to the owner or owners of such conveyance, and relating to the same, or to the person to whom any package or bundle in such conveyance is intended to be delivered,) every person so offending shall forfeit, for every such offence, the sum of fifty dollars: Provided, That it shall be lawful for any person to send letters or packets by a special messenger.

Sec. 15. And be it further enacted, That the Deputy Postmasters and other agents of the Postmaster General, shall duly account and answer to him, for all way-letters, which shall come to their hands; and for this purpose the post-riders, and other carriers of the mail, receiving any way-letter or letters, (and it shall be their duty to receive them, if presented more than two miles from a Post Office,) shall deliver the same, together with the postage, if paid, at the first Post Office, to which they shall afterwards arrive, where the Postmaster shall duly enter the same, and specify the number and rate or rates in the post-bill, adding to the rate of each way-letter one cent, which shall be paid by the Deputy Postmaster, to the mail carrier from whom such way-letter shall be received; and that letters, directed to persons living between Post Offices, may be delivered, and the postage thereof duly collected, it shall be the duty of the carriers of the mail to take charge of, and deliver, all such letters as shall, for that purpose, be committed to them, by any Deputy Postmaster, and collect the postage thereof, which shall be paid over by such Deputy Postmaster, on demand, and for every letter so delivered, the mail carrier delivering the same shall be allowed to demand and receive two cents, to his own use, besides the ordinary postage; and if any Deputy Postmaster, or other agent of the Postmaster General, shall neglect so to account, he or they, so offending, shall, on conviction thereof, forfeit, for every such offence, a sum not exceeding fifty dollars: Provided, That no mail carriers shall make such deliveries at any place not on the Post Road: Provided also, That the receipts and delivery of letters on the way, between Post Offices, shall not be required of the mail carriers, in cases where, in the opinion of the Postmaster General, the time or manner of carrying the mail, or the speed of conveyance, is incompatible with such receipts and deliveries.

SEC. 16. And be it further enacted, That if any person employed in any of the departments of the General Post Office, shall unlawfully detain, delay, or open, any letter, packet, bag, or mail of letters, with which he shall be intrusted, or which shall have come to his possession, and which are intended to be conveyed by post; or if any such person shall secrete, embezzle, or destroy, any letter or packet, intrusted to him, as aforesaid, and which shall not contain any security for, or assurance relating to, money, as hereinafter described, every such offender, being thereof duly convicted, shall, for every such offence, be fined, not exceeding three hundred dollars, or imprisoned, not exceeding six months, or both, according to the circumstances and aggravations of the offence. And if any person, employed as aforesaid, shall secrete, embezzle, or destroy, any letter, packet, bag, or mail of letters, with which he shall be intrusted, or which shall have come to his possession, and are intended to be conveyed by post, containing any bank note, or bank post bill, bill of exchange, warrant of the Treasury of the United States, note of assignment of stock in the funds, letters of attorney for receiving annuities or dividends, or for selling stock in the funds, or for receiving the interest thereof, or any letter of credit, or note for or relating to the payment of money, or any bond or warrant, draft, bill, or promissory note, whatsoever, for the payment of money; or if any such person, employed as aforesaid, shall steal or take any of the same, out of any letter, packet, bag, or mail of letters, that shall come to his possession, he shall, on conviction for any such offence, suffer death. And if any person, who shall have taken charge of the mail of the United States, shall quit or desert the same, before his arrival at the next Post Office, every such person, so offending, shall forfeit and pay a sum not exceeding five hundred dollars, for every such offence. And if any person concerned in carrying the mail of the United States, shall collect, receive, or carry, any letter or packet, or shall cause or procure the same to be done, contrary to this act, every such offender shall forfeit and pay, for every such offence, a sum not exceeding fifty dollars.

SEC. 17. And be it further enacted, That if any person or persons shall rob any carrier of the mail of the United States of such mail, or any part thereof, such offender or offenders shall, on conviction thereof, suffer death. And if any person shall steal the mail, or shall steal and take from any letter or packet, such person shall, upon conviction, for every such offence, be fined, not exceeding three hundred dollars, or imprisoned, not exceeding six months, or both, according to the circumstances and aggravations of the offence.

SEC. 18. And be it further enacted, That the Deputy Postmasters shall, respectively, publish, at the expiration of every three months, or oftener, when the Postmaster General shall so direct, in one of the newspapers published at or nearest the place of his residence, for three successive weeks, a list of all the letters remaining in their respective offices, or, instead thereof, shall make out a number of such lists, and cause them to be posted at such public places in their vicinity, as shall appear to them best adapted for the information of the parties concerned; and, at the expiration of the next three months, shall send such of the said letters as then remain on hand as dead letters, to the General Post Office, where the same shall be opened and inspected; and if any valuable papers or matter of consequence, shall be found therein, it shall be the duty of the Postmaster General to cause a descriptive list thereof to be inserted in one of the newspapers published at the place most convenient to the supposed residence of the owner, if within the United States; and such letter, and the contents, shall be preserved, to be delivered to the person to whom the same shall be addressed, upon payment of the postage, and the expense of publication. And if such letter, with its contents, be not demanded by the person to whom it is addressed, or the owner thereof, or his lawful agent, within two years after the advertisement thereof, as aforesaid, the said contents shall be applied to the use of the United States, until the same shall be reclaimed by the proprietor thereof. The manner of such application to be specially stated by the Postmaster General to the Secretary of the Treasury.

SEC. 19. And be it further enacted, That the following letters and packets, and no other, shall be received and conveyed by post, free of postage, under such restrictions as are hereinafter provided; that is to say, all letters and packets to or from the President or Vice President of the United States, and all letters and packets, not exceeding two ounces in weight, to or from any member of the Senate or House of Representatives, the Secretary of the Senate or Clerk of the House of Representatives, during their actual attendance in any session of Congress, and twenty days after such session; all letters to and from the Secretary of the Treasury, Comptroller, Register, and Auditor of the Treasury, the Treasurer, the Secretary of State, the Secretary at War, the Commissioner of the Revenue, the Postmaster General, his Assistant, and Deputies: And the Deputy Postmasters shall receive, besides their other allowance as, two cents for each free letter or packet, (their own excepted,) which shall be delivered to the person addressed out of their respective offices. Provided, That no person shall frank or enclose any letter or packet other than his own; but any public letter or packet from the Department of the Treasury, may be franked by the Secretary of the Treasury, or by the Commissioner of the Revenue, Comptroller, Register, Auditor, or Treasurer: And that each person before named shall deliver into the Post Office every letter or packet enclosed to him, which may be directed to any other person, noting the place from whence it came by post, and the usual postage shall be charged thereon: And provided also, That no letter to or from a Deputy Postmaster shall be free of postage, if it exceeds half an ounce in weight.

SEC. 20. And be it further enacted, That, if any person shall counterfeit the handwriting of any other person, in order to evade the payment of postage, such person or persons so offending, and being thereof duly convicted, shall forfeit and pay, for every such offence, the sum of one hundred dollars.

SEC. 21. And be it further enacted, That every printer of newspapers may send one paper to each and every other printer of newspapers within the United States, free of postage, under such regulations as the Postmaster General shall provide.

SEC. 22. And be it further enacted, That all newspapers conveyed in the mail shall be under cover, open at one end, carried in separate bags from the letters, and charged with the payment of one cent each, for any distance not more than one hundred miles, and one cent and a half for any greater distance: Provided, That the postage of a single newspaper, from any one place to another, in the same State, shall not exceed one cent: And that, where the mode of conveyance and the size of the mail will admit of it, magazines and pamphlets may be transported in the mail, at one cent per sheet for conveyance, any distance not exceeding fifty miles; one and a half cent for any distance over fifty miles, and not exceeding one hundred; and two cents per sheet, for any greater distance. And it shall be the duty of the Postmaster General and his deputies, to keep a separate account for the newspapers, magazines, and pamphlets; and the Deputy Postmasters shall receive fifty per cent, on the postage thereof, exclusively of their other allowances: And if any letter, memorandum in writing, or other thing, be enclosed in, or placed among such newspapers, or if any note or memorandum, other than the name of the person to whom it is addressed, be written upon any such newspaper, the letter, memorandum, or other thing, as enclosed or placed, and the newspaper shall be detained by the Deputy Postmaster, until a sum shall be paid him equal to the postage of the whole packet in which they shall be found, calculating such postage at the rates established by this act for letters and packets: And that any printer, or other person, who shall conceal a letter, or any memorandum in writing, in a newspaper or among any package of newspapers, shall be liable, on conviction, to a fine for each offence, not exceeding five dollars. And if any of the persons employed in any department of the Post Office, shall unlawfully detain, delay, embezzle, or destroy any newspaper, magazine, or pamphlet, with which he shall be intrusted, such offenders, for every such offence, shall forfeit a sum not exceeding fifty dollars: Provided, That the Postmaster General, in any contract he may enter into for the conveyance of the mail, may authorize the person with whom such contract is made, to carry newspapers, magazines, and pamphlets, other than those carried in the mail.

SEC. 23. And be it further enacted, That the Postmaster General be, and he is hereby, authorized to allow to the Deputy Postmasters, respectively, such commissions on the moneys arising from the postage of letters and packets, as he shall think adequate to their respective services and expenses: Provided, The said commission shall not exceed twenty per cent. to any one deputy, except the Postmaster at the port where the European packets do or shall arrive, to whom such further allowance, in addition to the emoluments of his office, shall be made, as the Postmaster General shall deem a reasonable compensation for his extra services, in the receipt and despatch of letters originally received into his office, from on board such packets, and by him forwarded to other offices: And except the Deputy Postmaster at Burlington, on Lake Champlain, whose compensation the Postmaster General is hereby authorized to augment, on account of his extra trouble in receiving mails passing to and from Canada, to a sum not exceeding one hundred dollars per annum: And except certain Deputy Postmasters, who are obliged to rise in the night to receive mails, whose compensations the Postmaster General is hereby authorized to increase, not exceeding forty per cent. on the amount of moneys arising on the postage of letters and packets: And provided also, That the compensations aforesaid shall not exceed one thousand eight hundred dollars per annum to any one Postmaster, excepting the Deputy Postmaster of Philadelphia, who shall be allowed a compensation not exceeding the sum of three thousand five hundred dollars a year, including all perquisites and emoluments, of which a regular account shall be rendered to the Deputy Postmaster General: And excepting the Deputy Postmaster at New York, who shall be allowed a compensation, not exceeding two thousand seven hundred dollars a year, including all perquisites and emoluments, of which a regular account shall be rendered, as aforesaid: Provided also, That the reasonable charges of the Deputy Postmasters for stationery, for cases necessary for the safe-keeping and convenient distribution of letters, and for advertising the lists of letters, from time to time remaining in their offices, accompanied with proper vouchers, shall be admitted by the Postmaster General, and placed to their credit: And there shall also be allowed to the Deputy Postmaster of Philadelphia, for his extraordinary expenses, incurred in the execution of his office, under the existing law, an additional compensation, at the rate of eight hundred and fifty dollars a year, to be computed from the first day of July, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-two, to the first day of June next.

SEC. 24. And be it further enacted, That, if any Deputy Postmaster, or other person authorized to receive the postage of letters and packets, shall neglect or refuse to render his accounts and pay over to the Postmaster General the balance by him due at the end of every three months, it shall be the duty of the Postmaster General to cause a suit to be commenced against the person or persons so neglecting or refusing; and if the Postmaster General shall not cause such suit to be commenced within six months from the end of every such delinquent shall be charged to and recoverable from the Postmaster General.

SEC. 25. And be it further enacted, That all pecuniary penalties and forfeitures incurred under this act, shall be one-half for the use of the person or persons informing and prosecuting for the same, and the other half to the use of the United States.

SEC. 26. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for the Postmaster General to make provision, where it may be necessary, for the receipt of all letters and packets intended to be conveyed by any ship or vessel beyond sea, or from any port of the United States, to another port therein; and the letters so received shall be formed into a mail, sealed up, and directed to the Postmaster of the port to which each ship or vessel shall be bound. And for every letter or packet so received there shall be paid, at the time of its reception, a postage of one cent, which shall be for the use of the Postmaster respectively receiving the same. And the Postmaster General may make arrangements in the Postmasters in any foreign country for the reciprocal receipt and delivery of letters and packets through the post office.

SEC. 27. And be it further enacted, That the Deputy Postmasters and the persons employed in the transportation of the mail shall be exempt from militia duties, or any fine or penalty for neglect thereof.

SEC. 28. And be it further enacted, That letter-carriers shall be employed at such post offices as the Postmaster General shall direct for the delivery of letters in the places respectively where such post offices are established; and, for the delivery of each such letter, the letter carrier may receive of the person to whom the delivery is made two cents: Provided, That no letter shall be delivered to such letter carrier for distribution addressed to any person who shall have lodged at the post office a written request that his letters shall be detained in the office. And, for every letter lodged at any post office, not to be carried by post, but to be delivered to the place where it is so lodged, the Deputy Postmaster shall receive one cent of the person to whom it shall be delivered.

SEC. 29. And be it further enacted, That this act shall be in force from the first day of June next.

Approved, May 8, 1794.

Approved, May 30, 1794.

An Act further extending the time for receiving on Loan the Domestic Debt of the United States.

Be it enacted, &c., That the term for receiving on Loan that part of the Domestic Debt of the United States which shall not have been subscribed in pursuance of the act entitled "An act for extending the time for receiving on Loan that part of the Domestic Debt of the United States which may not be subscribed prior to the first day of March, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-three," be, and the same is hereby further extended from and after the last day of June ensuing, until the last day of December next, inclusively, on the same terms and conditions as are contained in the act, entitled "An act making provision for the Debt of the United States." Provided, That the books for receiving the said subscriptions shall be opened only at the Treasury of the United States.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That such of the creditors of the United States as have not subscribed and shall not subscribe to the said Loan, shall nevertheless receive, during the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-four, a rate per centum on the amount of such of their demands, as have been registered or as shall be registered at the Treasury, conformably to the directions in the act, entitled "An act making provision for the Debt of the United States," equal to the interest which would be payable to them as subscribing creditors.

Approved, May 30, 1794.

An Act making provision for the payment of the interest on the balances due to certain States, upon a final settlement of the accounts between the United States and the individual States.

Be it enacted, &c., That interest upon the balances reported to be due to certain States, by the Commissioners for settling accounts between the United States and individual States, be allowed, from the last day of December, one thousand seven hundred and eighty-nine, and to be computed to the last day of December, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-four, at the rate of four per centum per annum; and that the amount of such interest be placed to the credit of the State to which the same shall be found due, upon the books of the Treasury of the United States, and shall bear an interest of three per centum per annum, from and after the said last day of December, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-four.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the interest on the said balances, reported by the said Commissioners as aforesaid, which shall be funded, agreeably to the terms of the act, entitled "An act to provide more effectually for the settlement of the accounts between the United States and the individual States," together with the interest on the amount placed to the credit of any such State, for arrearages of interest on such balances, agreeably to the terms of this act, be paid quarter-yearly, after the said last day of December, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-four; that is to say: one-fourth part thereof on the last days of March, June, September, and December, respectively, in each year, at the offices of the Commissioners of Loans, within such States as shall be entitled to receive the same; the first payment to be made on the last day of March, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-five: And for the payment of the said interest, so much of the duties arising yearly, on imports and tonnage, from and after the last day of December, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-four, as may be necessary, and not heretofore otherwise appropriated, be, and the same is hereby, pledged and appropriated; and that the faith of the United States be, and the same is hereby, pledged to provide for any deficiency that may happen by such additional and permanent funds as may be necessary therefor.

Approved, May 31, 1794.

An Act to authorize the President of the United States to lay, regulate, and revoke Embargoes.

Be it enacted, &c., That the President of the United States be, and he hereby is, authorized and empowered, whenever in his opinion the public safety shall so require, to lay an embargo on all ships and vessels in the ports of the United States, or upon the ships and vessels of the United States, or the ships and vessels of any foreign nation, under such regulations as the circumstances of the case may require, and to continue or revoke the same, whenever he shall think proper; and the President is hereby fully authorized to give all such orders to the officers of the United States as may be necessary to carry the same into full effect: Provided, That the authority aforesaid shall not be exercised while the Congress of the United States shall be in session. And any embargo which may be laid by the President, as aforesaid, shall cease and determine in fifteen days from the actual meeting of Congress next after laying the same.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That this act shall continue and be in force until fifteen days after the commencement of the next session of Congress, and no longer.

Approved, June 4, 1794.

An Act providing for the payment of the second installment due on a Loan made of the Bank of the United States.

Be it enacted, &c., That the President of the United States be, and he hereby is, authorized and empowered to apply two hundred thousand dollars of the proceeds of foreign Loans heretofore transferred to the United States, in payment of the second instalment due to the Bank of the United States, upon a Loan of the said Bank, made pursuant to the eleventh section of the act for incorporating the subscribers to the said Bank; and that the annual period for the payment of each instalment of the said Loan shall be deemed to be the last day of December in each year.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That a sufficient sum of the dividends which have accrued, or which shall hereafter accrue, on the stock owned by the United States, in the Bank of the United States, be, and the same is hereby, appropriated to the payment of the interest which has or shall become due on the Loans obtained as aforesaid.

Approved, June 4, 1794.

An Act for extending the benefit of a Drawback and terms of Credit, in certain cases, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, &c., That in all cases where the term allowed by law for the exportation of goods, wares, or merchandise, with the benefit of a drawback of the duties thereupon, shall have expired after the last day of January last past, and previous to the last day of July next, there shall be allowed further time for the exportation, with the benefit aforesaid, until the said last day of July next.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That on all bonds which may have been given for duties on coffee, sugar, and indigo, imported into the United States, and which shall be unpaid at the passing of this act, all that time from the last day of January last past to the last day of May instant, shall be considered as no part of the time allowed by law for the payment of the said duties, but the importer shall enjoy the same term of credit as if the said period had not intervened: Provided, That in every case where the extension of credit is claimed and granted under this act, new act bonds shall be extended, with one or more sureties, to the satisfaction of the collector of the district.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That in cases where the certificates and evidence now required by law for authorizing the payment of any drawback or allowance on any goods, wares, or merchandise, exported since the first day of July, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-two, or which may be hereafter exported, are not and cannot be obtained, the exporter or exporters of such goods, wares, or merchandise, shall nevertheless be permitted to offer such other proof as to the delivery thereof, without the limits of the United States, as he or they may have, to the Comptroller of the Treasury, who shall, if the same proof shall be satisfactory to him, direct the payment of the drawback or allowance: Provided, always, That in no case shall a drawback be hereafter paid on any goods, wares, or merchandise, until the duties on the importation thereof shall have been first received.

Approved, June 4, 1794.

his or her option to make payment in manner last mentioned, upon the condition following, that is to say: that he or she, if having or keeping a carriage or carriages, shall be liable to duty, on the first day of September next, shall, within the said month of September, or, if beginning to have or keep such carriage or carriages, at any time after the said first day of September, shall, within thirty days after he or she shall so begin to have or keep such carriage or carriages, give notice thereof in writing, at the office of inspection, nearest to his or her said place of habitation, by transmitting a list thereof, of the like kind and description with that directed and described in the third section of this act, and expressing thereupon, that he or she doth elect to pay the yearly duty or duties payable upon the carriage or carriages therein mentioned, upon demand of him or her, at his or her said place of habitation, and upon this further condition, that he or she shall pay, upon such demand, in addition to the said duty or duties, a commission of one per centum upon the amount thereof, for the benefit of the officer or person by whom the said demand shall have been made.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That every person who shall make such election, as aforesaid, shall pay, or cause to be paid yearly, and every year after the month of September, upon the calling for that purpose, at his or her said place of habitation, of any officer of inspection, or person thereunto authorized, the amount of duty or duties by him or her payable, upon the carriage or carriages, as aforesaid, so long as he or she shall continue to have or keep the same, and until he or she shall give notice in writing, at the office of inspection, to which the said list shall have been transmitted, that he or she hath sold, or otherwise assigned, or alienated, any carriage or carriages therein mentioned: in default of which payment, the duty or duties, and commission thereupon, in respect to which any such default shall be made, shall and may be sued for and recovered in any Court of the United States, or of either of them, or shall and may be levied, together with reasonable charges, by distress and sale of the goods and chattles of the person making such default.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That if any person, by whom such election as aforesaid shall have been made, shall omit to notify, in manner herein before directed, any carriage or carriages liable to duty, by this act, which he or she shall, at any time, have or keep, he or she shall, in respect to such carriage or carriages, stand and be in the same predicament as persons by whom no such election shall have been made, and shall incur the like penalties and forfeitures; as such persons are by this act made liable to, for neglecting or omitting to bring, or send and deliver, true and exact lists of the carriages by them respectively had or kept, and paying the duties thereupon in manner herein directed.

Sec. 7. Provided, always, and be it further enacted, That it shall be, at any time, lawful for any such person, who shall have made any such election, as aforesaid, by notice in writing under his or her hand, sent to and delivered at the same office of inspection, where the notice of such election shall have been given, to revoke the said election; after which revocation, he or she shall stand, and be, as to all matters and things directed and prescribed by this act, in the same situation as if no such election had been made.

Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That the supervisors of the revenue shall have power, from time to time, to examine upon oath or affirmation any officers or persons employed under them in the collection and receipts of the duties aforesaid.

Sec. 9. And be it further enacted, That if any person shall wilfully swear or affirm falsely, touching any matter herein before required to be verified by oath or affirmation, he or she shall suffer the pains and penalties which by law are prescribed for wilful and corrupt perjury; and, if an officer, shall forfeit his office, and be incapable of afterwards holding any office under the United States.

Sec. 10. And be it further enacted, That all fines, penalties, and forfeitures, which shall be incurred pursuant to this act, shall be divided and distributed, one-half thereof to the use of the United States, and the other half thereof to the use of the person, who, if an officer of inspection, shall first discover, if not an officer of inspection, shall first give information of the cause, matter, or thing, whereby any of the said penalties or forfeitures shall have been incurred, and as well the duties hereby laid, as the said fines, penalties, and forfeitures, all or any of them, shall and may be sued for, and recovered, in any Court of the United States, or before any magistrate, or State Court, having competent jurisdiction.

Sec. 11. And be it further enacted, That this act shall continue and be in force for and during the term of two years, and from thence to the end of the next session of Congress and no longer.

Approved, June 5, 1794.

An Act to authorize the President of the United States, during the recess of the present Congress, to cause to be purchased or built a number of vessels, to be equipped as galleys, or otherwise, in the service of the United States.

Be it enacted, &c., That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized, during the recess of the present Congress, if the same shall appear to him necessary for the protection of the United States, to cause a number of vessels not exceeding ten, to be built or purchased, and to be fitted out, manned, armed, and equipped, as galleys, or otherwise, in the service of the United States, the officers and men to be on the same pay and to receive the same subsistence as officers of the same rank and men are entitled to in the Navy of the United States.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the said officers shall be appointed and commissioned by the President of the United States, and the said galleys or vessels be stationed in such parts of the United States as he may direct.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That there be appropriated for the purpose of eighty thousand dollars, to be paid out of the proceeds of any revenues of the United States which now are, or hereafter, during the present session, shall be provided, not being otherwise appropriated. And that the President of the United States be authorized to take on loan of the Bank of the United States, or of any other body politic or corporate, person or persons, the said sum of eighty thousand dollars, to be reimbursed, principal and interest, out of the said proceeds, appropriated, as aforesaid, according to such contract or contracts which shall be made concerning the same.

Approved, June 5, 1794.

An Act authorizing a settlement of certain expenses of the Commissioners of Loans.

Be it enacted, &c., That the Commissioners of Loans in the several States shall be allowed, in the settlement of their accounts, such sums as shall appear to have been necessarily expended by them in the purchase of stationery for the use of their several offices, and also for the hire of clerks to assist in executing the duties of their respective offices, from and after the first day of March, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-three, until the last day of the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-four, inclusively.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That a sufficient sum of the proceeds of the duties on imports and tonnage, not exceeding the sum of fifteen thousand dollars, be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, to the payment of such of the expenses before mentioned as shall accrue during the present year and be allowed on settlement at the Treasury.

Approved, June 5, 1794.

An Act laying duties on licenses for selling wines and foreign distilled spirituous liquors by retail.

Be it enacted, &c., That every person who shall deal in the selling of wines, to be carried or sent out of the house, building, or place of his or her dwelling, in a less quantity, or in less quantities, at one time, than thirty gallons, except in the original cask, case, box, or package, wherein the same shall have been imported, shall be deemed to be, and hereby is declared to be, a retail dealer in wines, within the meaning of this act; and that every person, who shall deal in the selling of any foreign distilled spirituous liquors, to be carried or sent out of the house, building, or place of his or her dwelling, in less quantities than twenty gallons, at one time, shall be deemed to be, and hereby is declared to be a retail dealer in foreign distilled spirituous liquors: Provided always, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to extend to persons, who, as keepers of taverns, inns, or houses of entertainment, duly licensed or authorized under any law of a State, shall vend or sell really and truly for consumption, within the houses, buildings, or premises, only, by them respectively occupied or kept, as taverns, inns, or other houses of entertainment, wines or distilled spirituous liquors, in whatsoever quantity, nor to physicians, apothecaries, surgeons, or chemists, as to any wines or spirituous liquors, which they may use in the preparation or making up of medicines, for sick, lame, or diseased persons only.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That every person, who, on the thirtieth day of September next, shall be a retail dealer in wines, or foreign distilled spirituous liquors, as above described and defined, both, or either of them, shall, before the said day, and every person, who, after the said day, shall become or intend to become such retail dealer in wines or foreign distilled spirituous liquors, both or either of them shall, before he or she shall begin to vend or sell by retail, any wine or wines, or foreign distilled spirituous liquors, apply for and obtain, in manner hereinafter directed, a license for carrying on the business of retailing wines or foreign distilled spirituous liquors, as the case may be, that is to say: one license for carrying on the business of retailing wines, and another license for carrying on the business of retailing foreign distilled spirituous liquors; which licenses respectively, shall be granted for the term of one year upon the payment of five dollars for each license; and shall be renewed, yearly, upon the payment of the like sum of five dollars for each license. And if any person shall, after the said day, deal in selling of wines or foreign distilled spirituous liquors, by retail, as above described and defined, without having a license so forfeit and pay the sum of fifty dollars, to be recovered with costs of suit. And no such license shall be sufficient for the selling of wines or foreign distilled spirituous liquors, by retail at more than one place; but any person, who by color of such license shall sell any wines or foreign distilled spirituous liquors, at more than one place, shall be deemed to be, in respect to such of the said articles, as he or she shall so sell, at more than one place, a retail dealer therein without license, and shall forfeit and pay the like sum of fifty dollars, to be recovered with costs of suit.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the Supervisors of the Revenue, within their respective districts, to grant licenses for carrying on the said businesses, respectively, of retailing wines and foreign distilled spirituous liquors, which licenses shall be marked or stamped with a mark or stamp, denoting the sum of the duty thereupon; and shall be signed by the Supervisor of the Revenue, who shall issue the same, or cause the same to be issued, and shall be granted to any person, who shall desire the same upon application made at any office of inspection, for that purpose, in writing, specifying the name of the person for whom a license is requested, and the place or premises where the business, for which the same is requested to be carried on, and also upon payment or tender to the officer thereof, of the sum or duty payable by this act, upon each license requested. And to the end that all persons carrying on or intending to carry on, both or either of the said businesses, may obtain with ease and despatch the licenses, whereof they shall respectively stand in need, it is hereby made the duty of the respective Supervisors to prepare and furnish to the several Officers of Inspection acting under them, licenses signed by them with the proper marks and stamps in competent number, and with blanks for the names of the persons for whom they shall be requested, and the places or premises respectively where the business or businesses for which they are requested, is or are to be carried on. And the Officer of Inspection to whom such application and payment, or tender as aforesaid, shall be made, shall forthwith issue the licenses or licenses requested, having first filled the blanks therein, and countersigned the same: Provided always, That no license shall be granted to any person to sell wines or foreign distilled spirituous liquors, who is prohibited to sell the same by the laws of any State.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That the duties aforesaid, shall be received, collected, accounted for, and paid under and subject to the superintendence, control, and direction of the Department of the Treasury, according to the authorities and duties of the respective officers thereof.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That all fines, penalties, and forfeitures, which shall be incurred by force of this act, shall and may be sued for and recovered, in the name of the United States, or of the Supervisor of the Revenue, within whose district any such fine, penalty, or forfeiture shall have been incurred, by bill, plaint, or information, one moiety thereof to the use of the United States, and the other moiety thereof, to the use of the person, who, if an Officer of Inspection, shall first discover, if other than an Officer of Inspection, whereby any such fine, penalty, or forfeiture shall have been incurred, and where the cause of action or complaint shall arise or accrue more than fifty miles distant from the nearest place by law established for the holding of a District Court within the district in which the same shall arise or accrue, such suit and recovery may be had before any Court of the State holden within the said district having jurisdiction in like cases.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for the President of the United States, and he is hereby empowered, to make such allowances for compensation to the Officers of Inspection employed in the collection of the duties aforesaid, and for incidental expenses, as he shall judge reasonable, not exceeding in the whole, two and a half per centum of the total amount of the said duties collected.

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That this act shall continue and be in force for the term of two years, and from thence to the end of the then next session of Congress and no longer.

Approved, June 5, 1794.

An Act making further provision for securing and collecting the duties on foreign and domestic distilled spirits, stills, wines, and teas.

Be it enacted, &c., That, in order to facilitate and secure the collection of the revenue on distilled spirits, and stills, in such States as have been, or hereafter may be, erected, and in the Territories Northwest and South of the river Ohio, the President of the United States shall be and he is hereby authorized and empowered to form and erect such new districts and surveys, and to make such alterations in and additions to, the several districts, and in and to the several surveys thereof, as, from time to time, shall appear in his judgment expedient and necessary; and that it shall also be lawful for the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint such and so many supervisors, inspectors of surveys, and inspectors of ports, therein and therefor, as may be found necessary; and to assign to them compensations proportionate to those heretofore, or which may hereafter be, allowed to the officers of the revenue: Provided, That if the appointment of such supervisors and inspectors cannot be made during the present session of Congress, the President may, and he is hereby empowered to, make such appointments, during the recess of the Senate, by granting commissions, which will expire at the end of their next session.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That all spirits which shall be distilled in the United States, in stills which shall not have been previously entered at some office of inspection, shall be liable, together with the stills or other vessels used in the distillation thereof, to seizure and forfeiture.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That no drawback of the duty on distilled spirits, which shall be exported after the first day of July next, shall be allowed upon any quantity less than one hundred and fifty gallons.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful to import into the United States, in the same ship or vessel in which they were exported, any spirits distilled therein, which shall have been previously exported therefrom, on payment of the duties on spirits, of equal proof, distilled in the United States, and of a sum equivalent to the duties established by law upon the raw materials, from whence they shall have been distilled; and all such importations shall be made under the same regulations, and in such manner as is directed by law, in regard to the importation of foreign distilled spirits.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That, from and after the first day of July next, on the sale of any emptied cask, vessel, or package, which has been, or shall be, lawfully marked, as containing foreign or domestic distilled spirits, wines, or teas, and prior to the removal thereof, and to the delivery of the same to the purchaser, the marks or numbers which shall or may have been made thereon, by any officer of inspection, or by any person employed or authorized by any such officer, shall be defaced, cut off, or obliterated; and if any such cask, vessel, or package shall be sold, removed, delivered, or received, prior to such defacing, cutting off, or obliterating being made, every person concerned in the purchase, sale, or delivery, shall forfeit and pay the sum of fifty dollars.

Acts of Congress.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That all stills without heads, or other vessels that shall be used as stills in the distillation of ardent spirits, shall be duly entered by the owner or owners thereof, in the manner prescribed in and by the second section of the act entitled "An act concerning the duties on spirits distilled within the United States," passed on the eighth day of May, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-two, under the penalty of two hundred and fifty dollars, to be recovered and distributed as other forfeitures under this act, and the act entitled "An act repealing, after the last day of June next, the duties heretofore laid upon distilled spirits imported from abroad, and laying others in their stead, and also upon spirits distilled within the United States, and for appropriating the same," to which this is an amendment.

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That any person or persons, who shall counterfeit the certificates for, or the marks or numbers to be set upon, any cask, vessel, or package, containing wines, teas, or foreign or domestic distilled spirits, or upon stills, which the officers of inspection are or shall be authorized to make thereon, by and in pursuance of the laws concerning the same, or who shall fraudulently rub out or deface, prior to drawing off or emptying the contents, any marks or numbers set upon any cask or package of wine or tea, in pursuance of law, shall, for every such offence, forfeit and pay the sum of one hundred dollars.

Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That every owner or worker of a licensed still, shall be required to make oath or affirmation previous to any renewal of his license, that he has not distilled therein since the commencement of the term specified in such license, excepting only during the term for which it shall have been granted.

Sec. 9. And be it further enacted, That it shall and may be lawful for the Judicial Courts of the several States, and of the Territory of the United States Northwest of the river Ohio, and of the Territory of the United States South of the river Ohio, to take cognizance of all and every suit and suits, action and actions, cause and causes, arising under or out of the laws for collecting a revenue upon spirits distilled in the United States, and upon stills, which may arise or accrue at a greater distance than fifty miles from the nearest place established by law for holding a District Court.

Sec. 10. And be it further enacted, That, in case of the non-existence of an office of inspection in any county of the United States, every owner or possessor of a still shall make entry thereof in the manner required by the "Act (of the eighth of May, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-two) concerning the duties on spirits distilled within the United States," at some other office of inspection comprehended in the division or survey, in which the said still shall be, and that it shall and may be lawful for the President of the United States, to provide offices of inspection in special cases, provided the expense thereof shall not exceed ten thousand dollars.

Sec. 11. And be it further enacted, That every rectifier of low wines, or other distilled spirits, and every distiller of cordials and strong waters therefrom, shall enter at some office of inspection, all or any such low wines, or other distilled spirits, prior to the removal of them to his distillery or rectifying house, and prior to his beginning the rectifying, improving, or altering the quality, flavor, or proof thereof, under the penalty of one hundred dollars for every cask of one hundred gallons, and in the same proportion for every greater or less quantity.

Sec. 12. And be it further enacted, That it shall and may be lawful for the supervisors and inspectors of the revenue, at their own expense, to appoint deputies to aid them in the execution of their duties, in cases of occasional and necessary absence, or of sickness, and not otherwise.

Sec. 13. And be it further enacted, That the President of the United States be authorized to make such additional allowances for the space of one year, and from thence until the end of the next session of Congress, to the inspectors and collectors of revenue from distilled spirits, for their respective services subsequent to the thirtieth day of June next, as he shall deem reasonable and proper, so as that the additions to be made to the said allowances shall not exceed, in the whole, the sums heretofore allowed, by more than one-third.

Sec. 14. And be it further enacted, That, from and after the first day of October next, no supervisor or inspector of the revenue of the United States, shall be concerned or interested in any foreign trade or commerce, in the goods or merchandise to which the duties of his office relate, or in the sale of any wines, distilled spirits, or teas; and if any such supervisor or inspector shall be so concerned or interested, every such person shall be disqualified from holding such appointment for the term of seven years, and shall, moreover, forfeit and pay a sum not exceeding one hundred dollars, for every month which he or they shall be so interested in such foreign trade, or in the sale of wines, distilled spirits, or teas.

Sec. 15. And be it further enacted, That any proprietor of a still, the capacity of which does not exceed one hundred gallons, may be permitted to enter such still, for any term of time less than one year, and not less than one month, paying at the same rate as per month, any thing in any former law to the contrary notwithstanding.

Sec. 16. And be it further enacted, That a personal demand of the proprietor or proprietors of any still, of the duties due, or a notice in writing of the amount thereof left at his dwelling by the collector, shall have all the effect of a demand made, as required by the twenty-third section of the act entitled "An act repealing after the last day of June next, the duties heretofore laid upon distilled spirits imported from abroad, and laying others in their stead; and also upon spirits distilled within the United States, and for appropriating the same."

Sec. 17. And be it further enacted, That all fines, penalties, and forfeitures, which shall have been incurred by force of any present or future law of the United States for the laying, levying, and collecting of any duties or taxes, other than duties on goods, wares and merchandise imported, and on the tonnage of ships and vessels, shall and may be mitigated or remitted by the like ways and means, and upon and under the like conditions, regulations, and restrictions, as are contained, prescribed, authorized, and directed, in and by the act, entitled "An act to provide for mitigating or remitting the forfeitures and penalties accruing under the revenue laws in certain cases therein mentioned," touching fines, penalties, and forfeitures incurred or accruing in relation to the cases therein mentioned; which act, and every clause, matter, and thing therein contained, shall be of like force and effect, for the mitigating or remitting of fines, penalties, and forfeitures, which shall have been incurred in reference to said other duties and taxes, as if the same were repeated and re-enacted, in the several and respective laws, for laying, levying, and collecting the said other duties and taxes.

Sec. 18. And be it further enacted, That the Judicial Courts of the several States, to whom, by this act, a jurisdiction is given, shall and may exercise all and every power in the cases cognizable before them, for the purpose of obtaining a mitigation or remission of any fine, penalty, or forfeiture which may be exercised by the Judges of the District Courts in cases depending before them. The said State Courts first causing reasonable notice to be given to the person or persons claiming such fine, penalty, or forfeiture, and to the attorney, who may, under warrant from the attorney of the district, prosecute for the United States, in such Court, that each may have an opportunity of showing cause against the mitigation or remission thereof.

Sec. 19. And be it further enacted, That the act, entitled "An act repealing after the last day of June next, the duties heretofore laid upon distilled spirits imported from abroad, and laying others in their stead, and also upon spirits distilled within the United States, and for appropriating the same," and the act, entitled "An act concerning duties on spirits distilled in the United States," shall extend to and be in full force for the recovery and distribution of the penalties and forfeitures herein contained, and generally for the execution of this act, as fully and effectually, as if every regulation, restriction, penalty, provision, clause, matter, and thing, therein contained, were inserted in and re-enacted by this present act, subject only to the alterations hereby made.

Approved, June 5, 1794.

An Act in addition to the act for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States.

Be it enacted, &c., That if any citizen of the United States shall, within the territory or jurisdiction of the same, accept and exercise a commission to serve a foreign Prince or State, in war, by land or sea, the person so offending shall be deemed guilty of a high misdemeanor, and shall be fined, not more than two thousand dollars, and shall be imprisoned not exceeding three years.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted and declared, That, if any person shall, within the territory or jurisdiction of the United States, enlist or enter himself, or hire or retain another person to enlist or enter himself, or to go beyond the limits or jurisdiction of the United States, with intent to be enlisted or entered in the service of any foreign Prince or State, as a soldier, or as a marine or seaman on board of any vessel of war, letter of marque, or privateer, every person so offending shall be deemed guilty of a high misdemeanor, and shall be fined not exceeding one thousand dollars, and be imprisoned not exceeding three years: Provided, That this shall not be construed to extend to any subject or citizen of a foreign Prince or State who shall transiently be within the United States, and shall, on board of any vessel of war, letter of marque, or privateer, which, at the time of its arrival within the United States, was fitted and equipped as such, enlist or enter himself, or hire or retain another subject or citizen of the same foreign Prince or State, who is transiently within the United States, to enlist or enter himself to serve such Prince or State, on board such vessel of war, letter of marque, or privateer, if the Prince or State shall then be at peace with such Prince or State: And provided further, That if any person so enlisted shall within thirty days after such enlistment, voluntarily discover upon oath, to some justice of the peace or other civil magistrate, the person or persons by whom he was so enlisted, so as that he or they may be apprehended and convicted of the said offence, such person, so discovering the offender or offenders, shall be indemnified from the penalty prescribed by this act.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted and declared, That, if any person shall, within any of the ports, harbors, bays, rivers, or other waters of the United States, fit out and arm, or attempt to fit out and arm, or procure to be fitted out and armed, or shall knowingly be concerned in the furnishing, fitting out, or arming of any ship or vessel, with intent that such ship or vessel shall be employed in the service of any foreign Prince or State, to cruise or commit hostilities upon the subjects, citizens, or property of another foreign Prince or State, with whom the United States are at peace, or shall issue or deliver a commission, within the territory or jurisdiction of the United States, for any ship or vessel, to the intent that she may be employed as aforesaid, every such person so offending shall, upon conviction, be adjudged guilty of a high misdemeanor, and shall be fined and imprisoned at the discretion of the Court in which the conviction shall be had, so as the fine to be imposed shall in no case be more than five thousand dollars, and the term of imprisonment shall not exceed three years; and every such ship or vessel, with her tackle, apparel, and furniture, together with all materials, arms, ammunition, and stores, which may have been procured for the building or equipment thereof, shall be forfeited, one-half to the use of any person who shall give information of the offence, and the other half to the use of the United States.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted and declared, That, if any person shall, within the territory or jurisdiction of the United States, increase or augment, or procure to be increased or augmented, or shall be knowingly concerned in increasing or augmenting, the force of any ship of war, cruiser, or other armed vessel, which, at the time of her arrival within the United States, was a ship of war, cruiser, or armed vessel, in the service of a foreign Prince or State, or belonging to the subjects or citizens of such Prince or State, the same being at war with another foreign Prince or State, with whom the United States are at peace, by adding to the number or size of the guns of such vessel prepared for use, or by the addition thereto of any equipment solely applicable to war, every such person so offending shall, upon conviction, be adjudged guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall be fined and imprisoned, at the discretion of the Court in which the conviction shall be had, so as that such fine shall not exceed one thousand dollars, nor the term of imprisonment be more than one year.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted and declared, That, if any person shall, within the territory or jurisdiction of the United States, begin or set on foot or provide or prepare the means for any military expedition or enterprise, to be carried on from thence against the territory or dominions of any foreign Prince or State with whom the United States are at peace, every such person so offending, shall, upon conviction, be adjudged guilty of a high misdemeanor, and shall suffer fine and imprisonment, at the discretion of the Court in which the conviction shall be had, so as that such fine shall not exceed three thousand dollars, nor the term of imprisonment be more than three years.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted and declared, That the District Courts shall take cognizance of complaints, by whomsoever instituted, in cases of captures made within the waters of the United States, or within a marine league of the coasts or shores thereof.

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted and declared, That, in every case in which a vessel shall be fitted out and armed, or attempted so to be fitted out, or armed, or in which the force of any vessel of war, cruiser, or other armed vessel, shall be increased or augmented, or in which any military expedition or enterprise shall be begun or set on foot, contrary to the prohibitions and provisions of this act; and in every case of the capture of a ship or vessel within the jurisdiction or protection of the United States, as above defined, and in every case in which any process issuing out of any Court of the United States shall be disobeyed or resisted by any person or persons having the custody of any vessel of war, cruiser, or other armed vessel, of any foreign Prince or State, or of the subjects or citizens of such Prince or State, in every such case it shall be lawful for the President of the United States, or such other person as he shall have empowered for that purpose, to employ such part of the land or naval forces of the United States, or of the militia thereof, as shall be judged necessary, for the purpose of taking possession of, and detaining any such ship or vessel, with her prize or prizes, if any, in order to the execution of the prohibitions and penalties of this act, and to the restoration such prize or prizes, in the cases in which redemption shall have been adjudged, and also for the purpose of preventing the carrying on of any such expedition or enterprise from the territories of the United States against the territories or dominions of a foreign Prince or State, with whom the United States are at peace.

Sec. 8. And be it further enacted and declared, That it shall be lawful for the President of the United States, or such other person as he shall have empowered for that purpose, to employ such part of the land or naval forces of the United States, or of the militia thereof, as shall be necessary, to compel any foreign ship or vessel to depart the United States, in all cases in which, by the laws of nations or the treaties of the United States, they ought not to remain within the United States.

Sec. 9. And be it further enacted, That nothing in the foregoing act shall be construed to prevent the prosecution or punishment of treason, or any piracy defined by a treaty or other law of the United States.

Sec. 10. And be it further enacted, That this act shall continue and be in force for and during the term of two years, and from thence to the end of the next session of Congress, and no longer.

Approved, June 5, 1794.

An Act laying certain duties upon Snuff and Refined Sugar.

Be it enacted de, That, from and after the thirtieth day of September next, there be levied, collected, and paid, upon all snuff, which, after that day, shall be manufactured for sale within the United States, at any manufactory, for every pound of snuff, eight cents.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That, from and after the said thirtieth day of September next, there be levied, collected, and paid, upon all sugar which shall be refined within the United States, a duty of two cents per pound.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the duties aforesaid shall be levied, collected, and accounted for by the same officers as are provided by the act, entitled "An act repealing, after the last day of June next, the duties heretofore laid upon distilled spirits imported from abroad, and laying others in their stead, and also upon spirits distilled within the United States, and for appropriating the same," subject to the superintendence and control of the Department of the Treasury, according to the respective authorities and duties of the officers thereof.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That every manufacturer of snuff, who shall be such, previous to, and on the thirtieth day of September next, shall, on the same day, and every manufacturer of snuff, who shall be, and become such, after the said day, shall, twenty days, at the least, previous to commencing the business of refining sugar, make true and exact entry and report in writing, at the office of inspection, which shall be nearest to the house or building, where he or she shall carry on, or intend to carry on, the said business, of every house or building, where such business shall be by him or her carried on, or intended so to be, and of every pan or boiler, together with the capacity of each, which he or she shall have, and employ, for the purpose of refining sugar, and shall also give bond in the sum of five thousand dol-act entry and report in writing, at the office of inspection, which shall be nearest to the house or building where he or she shall carry on, or intend to carry on the business or trade aforesaid, of every house or building where such business or trade shall be by him or her carried on, or intended so to be, and of every mill, specifying the number of mortars to each, which he or she shall have or keep therein, for the performing of any process, operation, matter, or thing, in, or about the manufacturing of snuff, and shall also give bond in the sum of five thousand dollars, with condition, that he or she shall, and will, from day to day, enter in a book, or on a paper to be kept for that purpose, all snuff, which he or she shall manufacture, or cause to be manufactured, and of the quantities, from day to day, by him or her sent out, or caused to be sent out of the house or building, where the same shall have been manufactured; and shall and will, on the first day of January, April, July, and October, in each year, render a just and true account of all the snuff, which he or she shall have manufactured or made, and sent out, or caused or procured to be manufactured, or made and sent out, first from the time of his or her entry and report aforesaid, until the day which shall first ensue, of the days above mentioned for the rendering of such account, and thenceforth, successively, from the time when such account ought to have been, and up to which it shall have been, rendered, until the day next thereafter of the days above mentioned for the rendering of such account; and shall and will, on the first day of January, April, July, and October, in each year, render a just and true account of all the snuff, which he or she shall have manufactured or made, and sent out, or caused or procured to be manufactured, or made and sent out, first from the time of his or her entry and report aforesaid, until the day which shall first ensue, of the days above mentioned for the rendering of such account, and thenceforth, successively, from the time when such account ought to have been, and up to which it shall have been, rendered, until the day next thereafter, of the days above mentioned for the rendering of such account; producing therewith the original book or paper, whereon the entries, from the time of rendering each account, pay or secure the duties, which, by this act, ought to be paid upon the snuff, in the said account mentioned and stated: And if any such manufacturer shall omit to make any such entry or report, or to give any such bond as is hereinbefore directed, he or she shall forfeit and lose every mill, together with the mortars and other utensils thereto belonging, which he or she shall have or keep, for the performing of any process, matter, or thing, in, or about the manufacturing of snuff, and shall also forfeit and pay the sum of five hundred dollars, to be recovered with costs of suit.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That every refiner of sugar, who shall be such, immediately before, and on the thirtieth day of September next, shall, on the said day, and every refiner of sugar, who shall be, and become such, after the said day, shall, twenty days, at the least, previous to commencing the business of refining sugar, make true and exact entry and report in writing, at the office of inspection, which shall be nearest to the house or building, where he or she shall carry on, or intend to carry on, the said business, of every house or building, where such business shall be by him or her carried on, or intended so to be, and of every pan or boiler, together with the capacity of each, which he or she shall have, and employ, for the purpose of refining sugar, and shall also give bond in the sum of five thousand dollars, with condition, that he or she shall and will enter or cause to be entered, in a book or paper, to be kept for that purpose, all sugar, which he or she shall refine, or cause to be refined, and of the quantities, from day to day, by him or her sent out, or caused to be sent out of the house or building, where the same shall have been refined, and shall, on the first day of January, April, July, and October, in each year, render a just and true account of all the refined sugar, which he or she shall have sent out, or caused or procured to be sent out, from the first time of his or her entry, and report aforesaid, until the day, which shall first ensue, of the days above mentioned, for the rendering of such account; and thenceforth, successively, from the time when such account ought to have been, and up to which it shall have been, rendered, until the day next thereafter of the days above mentioned for the rendering of such account, producing and showing therewith, the original book or paper, whereon the entries, from day to day, to be made as aforesaid, have been made; and he or she shall, at the time of rendering each account, pay or secure the duties, which by this act ought to be paid upon the refined sugar in the said account mentioned. And if any such refiner shall omit to make any such entry or report, he or she shall forfeit, and lose every pan or boiler which he or she shall have, and use, for the purpose of refining sugar, and shall also forfeit the sum of five hundred dollars, to be recovered with costs of suit.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That every such manufacturer of snuff shall, yearly, being thereto required by an officer of inspection, make oath or affirmation, according to the best of his or her knowledge and belief, that the accounts which have been by him or her rendered, of the quantities of snuff by him or her manufactured or made, and sent out, or caused or procured to be manufactured or made, and sent out, have been, and are, just and true.

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That every refiner of sugar shall, yearly, being thereto required by an officer of inspection, make oath or affirmation, according to the best of his or her knowledge and belief, that the accounts which have been by him or her rendered, of the quantities of refined sugar by him or her sent out of the house or building, where the same shall have been manufactured, or procured, or caused so to be sent out, have been just and true.

Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That if any person shall knowingly, and with design, falsely swear or affirm, touching any of the matters herein before required to be verified by oath or affirmation, he or she shall be deemed guilty of wilful and corrupt perjury.

Sec. 9. And be it further enacted, That every manufacturer of snuff and every refiner of sugar, shall, at each time of rendering an account, as herein before required, make a true and particular report of the engines, implements, and utensils, of the several descriptions herein before mentioned, which he or she, at any time since that of rendering his or her last account, hath used or kept, and shall then have, use, or keep, for carrying on his or her trade or business, on pain of forfeiting, for each and every neglect or omission, all such engines, implements, and utensils, together with the sum of five hundred dollars, to be recovered with costs of suit.

Sec. 10. And be it further enacted, That all snuff and refined sugar, which shall have been manufactured or made within the United States, in manner aforesaid, after the said thirtieth day of September next, whereof the duties aforesaid have not been duly paid or secured, according to the true intent and meaning of this act, shall, upon default being made in the paying or securing of the said duties, be forfeited, and shall and may be seized, as forfeited, by any officer of the inspection or of the customs.

Sec. 11. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for every such manufacturer of snuff, or refiner of sugar, at his or her option, either to pay, upon the rendering of his or her account, as aforesaid, the duties which shall thereby appear to be due and payable, with a deduction or abatement of six per cent for prompt payment, or to give bond, with one or more sureties, to the satisfaction of the officer of inspection, to whom such account shall be rendered, for the payment of the said duties at the expiration of nine months thereafter: Provided, That no person, whose bond for any of the said duties shall remain unpaid, beyond the term allowed for the payment thereof, shall be entitled to future credit for any of the said duties, so long as such bond shall remain unpaid.

Sec. 12. And be it further enacted, That, from and after the said thirtieth day of September next, there shall be levied, collected, and paid (in addition to the duties now payable thereupon) upon all manufactured tobacco or snuff, and upon all refined sugar, which, after the said day, shall be imported into the United States, from any foreign port or place, the following rates and duties, to wit: Upon tobacco, four cents per pound. Upon snuff, twelve cents per pound.

Which duties shall be collected in the same manner, by the same officers, under the like regulations, and subject to the like pains, penalties, and forfeitures, as now are collected the duties heretofore laid upon the said articles respectively: the act and acts concerning which are hereby declared to be, and shall be, in as full force, for the collection of the additional duties hereby paid, as if the said act and acts were herein particularly recited and repeated.

Sec. 13. And be it further enacted, That, from and after the thirty-first day of December next, no refined loaf or lump sugar shall be imported into the United States, from any foreign port or place, except in ships or vessels of the burden of one hundred and twenty tons and upwards, and in casks or packages containing, each, not less than six hundred pounds, on pain of forfeiting the said ships or vessels, and the loaf and lump sugar imported therein, except in such casks or packages as aforesaid.

Sec. 14. And be it further enacted, That, from and after the thirtieth day of September next, no drawback of the duties from any manufactured tobacco, or snuff, or refined sugar, shall have been imported into the United States from any foreign port or place, shall be allowed, but the duties hereby laid upon snuff manufactured within the United States, and sugar refined within the same, shall and may be drawn back upon all such of the said snuff manufactured within the United States and upon all such of the said sugar refined within the United States, after the said thirtieth day of September next, which, after the said day, shall be exported from the United States to any foreign port or place; and adding to the drawback upon sugar so exported, three cents per pound, on account of duties paid upon the importation of raw sugar. Provided, That no drawback shall be allowed on the exportation of either of the said articles in any instance where the same shall amount to less than twelve dollars.

Sec. 15. And be it further enacted, That, in order to entitle the exporter or exporters to the benefit of the said allowances, he, she, or they shall, previous to the putting or lading any of the said snuff or refined sugar on board of any ship or vessel for exportation, give six hours' notice at the least, to the proper officer of inspection of the port from which the said snuff or sugar shall be intended to be exported, of his, her, or their intention to export the same, and of the number of packages containing the same, and the respective marks thereof, and the place or places where deposited, and of the place to which, and ship or vessel in which they or either of them shall be so intended to be exported. Whereupon, it shall be the duty of the said officer to inspect, by himself or deputy, the packages so notified for exportation, and the same, after such inspection, shall be laden on board the same ship or vessel, of which notice shall have been given, and in the presence of the same officer or his deputy, who shall have inspected the same; which officer, after the same shall have been so laden on board, shall certify to the Collector of the District, the quantity and particulars of the article or articles so laden for exportation.

Sec. 16. Provided nevertheless, and be it further enacted, That the said allowance shall not be made, unless the said exporter or exporters shall make oath or affirmation, that the said snuff or sugar so notified for exportation and laden on board such ship or vessel, are truly intended to be exported to the place, whereof notice shall have been given, and are not intended to be reloaded within the United States, and that he or she doth verily believe that the duties thereupon charged by this act, have been duly paid or secured to be paid; and shall also give bond to the Collector, with two sureties, one of whom shall be the master, or other person having the command or charge of the ship or vessel in which the said snuff or sugar shall be intended to be exported; the other, such sufficient person as shall be approved by the said Collector, in the full value, in the judgment of the said Collector, of the said snuff or sugar so intended to be exported, with condition that the said snuff or sugar (the dangers of the seas and enemies excepted) shall be really and truly exported to, and landed in, some port or place without the limits of the United States, and that the said snuff or sugar shall not be unshipped from on board of the said ship or vessel, whereupon the same shall have been laden for exportation, within the said limits, or any ports or harbors of the United States, or reloaded in any other part of the same, (shipwreck or other unavoidable accident excepted.)

Sec. 17. Provided also, and be it further enacted, That the said allowance shall not be paid until nine months after the said snuff or sugar shall have been so exported: And provided also, That whenever the owner of any ship or vessel, on board of which, any such snuff or sugar are laden for exportation, shall make known to the Collector, previous to the departure of such ship or vessel from the port where such snuff or sugar are laden, that such ship or vessel is not going to proceed on the voyage intended, or the voyage is altered, it shall be lawful for the Collector to grant a permit for re-lading the same.

Sec. 18. And be it further enacted, That if any of the said snuff or sugar, after the same shall have been shipped for exportation, shall be unshipped for any purpose whatever, either within the limits of any part of the United States, or within four leagues of the coast thereof, or shall be reloaded within the United States, from on board the ship or vessel, wherein the same shall have been laden for exportation, unless the voyage shall not be proceeded on, or shall be altered as aforesaid, or unless in case of necessity or distress, to save the ship and goods from perishing, which shall be immediately made known to the principal officer of the customs, residing at the port nearest to which such ship or vessel shall be, at the time such necessity or distress shall arise, then not only the snuff or sugar so unshipped, together with the casks, vessels, and cases containing the same, but also the ship or vessel, in, or on board which, the same shall have been so shipped or laden, together with the guns, furniture, ammunition, tackle and apparel, and also the ship, vessel, or boat, into which the said snuff or sugar shall be unshipped or put, after the unshipping thereof, together with her guns, furniture, ammunition, tackle, and apparel, shall be forfeited, and may be seized by any officer of the customs or of inspection.

Sec. 19. And be it further enacted, That the bonds to be given, as aforesaid, shall, and may be discharged, by producing, within one year from the respective dates thereof (if the same shall be shipped to any part of Europe or America, and within two years, if shipped to any part of Asia or Africa; and if the delivery of the snuff or sugar, in respect to which the same shall have been given, be at any place, where a consul or other agent of the United States resides) a certificate of such consul or agent, or if there be no consul or agent, then a certificate of any two known and reputable American merchants residing at the said place; and if there be not two such merchants residing at the said place, then a certificate of any two reputable merchants testifying the delivery of the said snuff or sugar, at the said place. Which certificate shall, in each case, be confirmed by the oath or affirmation of the master and mate, or other like officer of the vessel in which the said snuff or sugar shall have been exported; and when such certificate shall be from any other than a consul or agent, or merchants of the United States, it shall be a part of the said oath or affirmation, that there were not, upon diligent inquiry, to be found two merchants of the United States at the said place: Provided always, That in case of death, the oath or affirmation of the party dying shall not be deemed necessary: And provided further, That the said oath or affirmation, taken before the chief civil magistrate of the place of the said delivery, and certified under his hand and seal, shall be of the same validity as if taken before a person qualified to administer oaths within the United States; or such bonds shall and may be discharged, upon proof that the snuff or sugar so exported, were taken by enemies, or perished in the sea, or destroyed by fire: The examination and proof of the same being left to the judgment of the collector of the customs, naval officer, and chief officer of inspection, or any two of them, of the place from which such snuff or sugar shall have been exported. And in cases wherein the certificates herein directed cannot be obtained, the exporter or exporters of such snuff or sugar shall nevertheless be permitted to offer such other proof as to the delivery of the said snuff or sugar, without the limits of the United States, as he or they may have; and if the same shall be deemed sufficient by the said Collector, he shall allow the same, except when the drawback to be allowed shall amount to one hundred dollars or upwards: In all which cases, the proofs aforesaid shall be referred to the Comptroller of the Treasury, whose decision thereon shall be final.

Sec. 20. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful to export, directly, from any manufactory of snuff, or of refined sugar, to any foreign port or place, any snuff or refined sugar which shall have been manufactured at such manufactory, after the said thirtieth day of September next, free from duty: Provided, That the same proceedings be had, in all respects, in order thereto, which are herein before prescribed, in order to the obtaining the benefit of the drawbacks of the duties which have been paid, or secured, upon any snuff or sugar exported to a foreign port or place.

Sec. 21. And be it further enacted, That all penalties and forfeitures which shall be incurred pursuant to this act, shall be divided and distributed, one-half thereof to the use of the United States, and the other half thereof to the use of the person who, if an officer of inspection, shall first discover, or if not an officer of inspection, shall first give information of the cause, matter, or thing, whereby any of the said penalties or forfeitures shall have been incurred.

Acts of Congress.

Sec. 22. And be it further enacted, That this act shall continue and be in force for the term of two years, and from thence to the end of the next session of Congress, and no longer.
Approved, June 5, 1794.

An Act in addition to the "Act for making further and more effectual provision for the protection of the frontiers of the United States."

Be it enacted, &c., That if any commissioned officer in the troops of the United States shall, while in the service of the United States, die, by reason of wounds received in actual service of the United States, and shall leave a widow, or, if no widow, shall leave a child or children, under age, such widow, or, if no widow, such child or children, shall be entitled to, and receive the half of the monthly pay, to which the deceased was entitled, at the time of his death, for and during the term of five years: And in case of the death or intermarriage of such widow, before the expiration of the said term of five years, the half-pay, for the remainder of the term, shall go to the child or children of such deceased officer, while under the age of sixteen years; and, in like manner, the allowance to the child or children of such deceased officer, where there is no widow, shall be paid no longer than while there is a child or children under the age aforesaid: Provided, That no greater sum shall be allowed, in any case, to the widow, or to the child or children of any officer, than the half pay of a lieutenant-colonel.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the Army be in future paid in such manner that the arrears shall at no time exceed two months.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That to such of the troops as are or may be employed on the frontiers, and under such special circumstances as, in the opinion of the President of the United States, may require an augmentation of some parts of their rations, the President be authorized to direct such augmentation as he may judge necessary, not exceeding four ounces of bread, two ounces of flour, and half a gill of rum or whiskey, in addition to each ration, and half a pint of salt to one hundred rations.
Approved, June 7, 1794.

An act to continue in force, for a limited time, the act supplementary to the act for the establishment and support of Light-houses, Beacons, Buoys, and Public Piers.

Be it enacted, &c., That the act, entitled "An act supplementary to the act for the establishment and support of light-houses, beacons, buoys, and public piers," be, and the same is hereby, continued in force, until the first day of July, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-five, so far as the same provides for defraying the necessary expense of supporting light-houses, beacons, buoys, and public piers, and the stakeage of channels on the sea-coast.

Approved, June 7, 1794.

On carriages, and parts of carriages, 4 1/2 per cent. ad valorem.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That after the said last day of June, instant, there shall be laid, levied, and collected, in addition to the present duty thereupon, a duty of two and a half per cent. ad valorem upon all goods, wares, and merchandise, which, if imported in ships or vessels of the United States, are now chargeable, by law, with a duty of seven and a half per cent. ad valorem.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the fourth section of the act, entitled "An act for raising a further sum of money for the protection of the frontiers, and for other purposes therein mentioned," whereby an additional duty of two and a half per cent. ad valorem, was laid upon certain goods, wares, and merchandise, be, and the same is hereby, continued in force, until the first day of January, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-seven.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That an addition of ten per centum shall be made to the several rates of duties, above specified and imposed, in respect to all goods, wares, and merchandise, which, after the said last day of June, instant, shall be imported in ships or vessels not of the United States.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That all duties which shall be paid, or secured to be paid, by virtue of this act, shall be returned or discharged, in respect to all such goods, wares, or merchandise, whereupon they shall have been so paid, or secured to be paid, as within twelve calendar months after payment made or security given, shall be exported to any foreign port or place, except one per centum on the amount of the said duties, which shall be retained, as an indemnification for whatever expense may have accrued concerning the same.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That the act, entitled "An act to provide more effectually for the collection of the duties imposed by law on goods, wares, and merchandise, imported into the United States, and on the tonnage of ships or vessels," shall extend to, and be in full force for the collection of the duties specified and laid in and by this act, and generally for the execution thereof, of, as fully and effectually as if every regulation, restriction, penalty, provision, clause, matter, and thing, therein contained, had been herein reinserted and re-enacted.

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That nothing in this act shall be construed to extend to, or affect the act, entitled "An act prohibiting for a limited time the exportation of arms and ammunition, and encouraging the importation of the same."

Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That this act shall continue in force until the first day of January, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-seven, and no longer.

Approved, June 7, 1794.

3d Cor.—47

An Act concerning Invalids.

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the War Department be, and he is hereby directed, to place upon the list of invalid pensioners of the United States all persons who have been returned as such by the Judges of the several Districts, under the act of Congress of the twenty-eighth of February, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-three, entitled "An act to regulate the claims to invalid pensions, and who, by legal proofs, are by him found to come clearly within the provisions of the said act, and are reported as having complete evidence of their claims in the report of the said Secretary upon that subject, made to Congress the twenty-fifth day of April, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-four; and all persons placed, by virtue of this act, on the list of invalid pensioners, shall receive such sums as the returns of the District Judges have respectively specified, and be paid in the same manner as invalid pensioners are paid, who have been heretofore placed on the list: Provided, That every commissioned officer who shall, by virtue of this act, be placed on the pension list as entitled to a sum less than a full pension, shall receive such pension only upon compliance with the same rule respecting a return of the commutation which he may have received, as is provided for in the case of Captain David Cook, by an act of Congress, passed December the sixteenth, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-one.

Approved, June 7, 1794.

An Act supplementary to the act, entitled "An act to promote the progress of Useful Arts."

Be it enacted, &c., That all suits, actions, processes, and proceedings, heretofore had in any District Court of the United States, under an act passed the tenth day of April, in the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety, entitled "An act to promote the progress of Useful Arts," which may have been set aside, suspended, or abated, by reason of the repeal of the said act, may be restored, at the instance of the plaintiff or defendant, within one year from and after the passing of this act, in the said Courts, to the same situation in which they may have been when they were so set aside, suspended, or abated; and that the parties to the said suits, actions, processes, or proceedings, be, and are hereby entitled to proceed in such cases as if no such repeal of the act aforesaid had taken place: Provided always, That, before any order or proceeding, other than that for continuing the same suits, after the reinstating thereof, shall be entered or had, the defendant or plaintiff, as the case may be, against whom the same may have been reinstated, shall be brought into Court by summons, attachments, or such other proceeding, as is used in other cases for compelling the appearance of a party.

lands lying Northwest of the river Ohio, between the Little Miami and Scioto.

Be it enacted, &c., That all said every officer and soldier of the Virginia line on Continental Establishment, his or their heirs or assigns, entitled to bounty lands on the Northwest side of the river Ohio, between the Scioto and Little Miami rivers, by the laws of the State of Virginia, and included in the terms of cession of the said State to the United States, shall, on producing the warrant, or a certified copy thereof, and a certificate, under the seal of the office where the said warrants are legally kept, that the same or a part thereof remains unsatisfied, and, on producing the survey, agreeably to the laws of Virginia, for the tract or tracts to which he or they may be entitled, as aforesaid, to the Secretary of the Department of War, such officer and soldier, his or their heirs or assigns, shall be entitled to and receive a patent for the same from the President of the United States; any thing in any former law to the contrary notwithstanding: Provided, That no letters patent shall be issued for a greater quantity of land than shall appear to remain due on such warrant; and that before the seal of the United States shall be affixed to such letters patent, the Secretary of the Department of War shall have endorsed thereon that the grantee therein named, or the person under whom he claims, was originally entitled to such bounty lands; and every such letters patent shall be countersigned by the Secretary of State, and a minute of the date thereof, and the name of the grantee shall be entered of record in his office, in a book to be specially provided for that purpose.

Approved, June 9, 1794.

An Act declaring the consent of Congress to an act of the State of Maryland, passed the twenty-eighth of December, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-three, for the appointment of a Health Officer.

Be it enacted, &c., That the consent of Congress be, and is hereby granted and declared to the operation of an act of the General Assembly of Maryland, passed the twenty-eighth of December, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-three, entitled "An act to appoint a Health Officer for the port of Baltimore, in Baltimore county," so far as to enable the State aforesaid to collect a duty of one cent per ton on all vessels coming into the district of Baltimore from a foreign voyage, for the purposes in the said act intended.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That this act shall continue in force to the end of the next session of Congress, and no longer.

Approved, June 9, 1794.

An Act making appropriations for certain purposes therein expressed.

Be it enacted, &c., That there be appropriated for the several purposes hereinafter specified, the respective sums following, to wit: To defray the expenses which shall be incurred pursuant to the act, entitled, "An act to provide a naval armament," six hundred and eighty-eight thousand eight hundred and eighty-eight dollars and eighty-two cents; in addition to the sum heretofore granted for the erection of fortifications for the protection of ports and harbors, thirty thousand dollars; for the payment of a sum granted to Lieutenant Colonel Toward, in lieu of his pension for life, three thousand six hundred dollars; for the payment of the salary allowed to the officer who shall be appointed to superintend the receiving, safe-keeping, and distribution of the military stores of the United States, pursuant to the act of the second of April last, eight hundred and seventy-five dollars; for the salary of an additional clerk and office rent, in the Department of State, four hundred and eighty-four dollars and seventy-eight cents; for the payment and subsistence of Captain John Inglis, of the North Carolina line, one hundred and eighty dollars and ninety-one cents; to defray the further contingent expenses of the House of Representatives, authorized during the present session, one thousand dollars; for the service of the War Department, in addition to the sums heretofore appropriated, the sums following to wit: To defray the expense of a corps of Artillerists and Engineers, established during the present session, sixty-six thousand four hundred and twenty-nine dollars and eighty-seven cents; for the further protection and defence of the Southwestern frontier, two hundred thousand dollars; for the purposes of the act directing a detachment from the Militia of the United States, two hundred thousand dollars; for the equipment of galleys or other vessels, pursuant to an act of the present session, eighty thousand dollars; for the expense of additional clerk hire in the Department of War, seven hundred and fifty dollars; for defraying the contingent expenses of Government, to be applied under the direction of the President of the United States, according to the regulations and provisions provided in respect of a sum of ten thousand dollars heretofore appropriated for the like purpose, twenty thousand dollars; amounting, in the whole, to one million two hundred and ninety-two thousand one hundred and thirty-seven dollars and thirty-eight cents; which several sums shall be paid out of the proceeds of such revenues as shall have been provided during the present session of Congress.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the President of the United States be empowered to borrow, on behalf of the United States, of the Bank of the United States, (which is hereby authorized to lend the same,) or of any other body or bodies politic, person or persons, any sum not exceeding in the whole, one million of dollars, to be applied to the purposes aforesaid, and to be reimbursed, as well interest as principal, out of the proceeds of the said revenues.

SEC. 3. Provided always, and be it further enacted, That there shall be reserved out of the proceeds of the said revenues a sum sufficient to pay the interest of whatever moneys may be borrowed pursuant to the act, entitled "An act making further provision for the expenses attending the intercourse of the United States with foreign nations;" and further to continue in force the act, entitled "An act providing the means of intercourse between the United States and foreign nations;" and such sum is hereby pledged and appropriated for that purpose, according to the terms of the contract or contracts which shall or may be made concerning the said moneys. And the faith of the United States is hereby pledged to make such further provision therefor as may be necessary.

Approved, June 9, 1794.

An Act making certain alterations in the act for establishing the Judicial Courts, and altering the time and place of holding certain Courts.

Be it enacted, &c., That the District Judges of the United States be authorized to appoint a commissioner or commissioners, before whom appraisers of ships or vessels, or goods, wares, and merchandise, seized for breaches of any law of the United States, may be sworn or affirmed; and that such qualifications made before such commissioner or commissioners shall be, to all intents and purposes, as effectual as if the same were taken before the said Judges in open Court.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the stated terms of the District Courts of Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, and Georgia, be changed, and that in future the said Courts in Massachusetts shall be held on the third Tuesday in March, the fourth Tuesday in June, the second Tuesday in September, and the first Tuesday in December. In Pennsylvania, on the third Mondays in February, May, August, and November. And in Georgia, at the times and places following: In the City of Savannah on the second Tuesdays in February, May, and August; and in Augusta on the second Tuesday in November. And that the Circuit Court of the District of Delaware hereafter commence on the second Monday in June, instead of the twenty-seventh day of April—any law to the contrary notwithstanding.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the State of North Carolina shall be divided into three districts, in which the District Court of the said State shall be held at such times and places as are already ascertained by law, that is to say: the District of Wilmington to include all the counties of the State districts of Morgan, Salisbury, Fayetteville, and Wilmington; the district of Newbern to include all the counties of the State districts of Hatteras, Beaufort, and Newbern; and Edenton to include all the counties of the district of Edenton; and that all process, pleas, actions, suits, and other proceedings, originating in the districts, respectively, shall be returnable to the session of said Court to be held at the place directed by law, within the same district where the cause commenced, and there to be kept, with the record thereof, until the final end and determination of the same. And, to the end that suitors, witnesses, and all others concerned, may have notice of this alteration in the said Courts, the Marshal of the said district of North Carolina is hereby required to make the same known, by proclamation, on or before the first day of August next.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That any person living within either of the districts aforesaid, who hereafter shall be arrested by virtue of process issuing out of the Court of either of the said districts other than that in which he shall reside, shall be discharged therefrom, on his entering his appearance and giving bail to the action in the Court of the district in which he shall so reside, in like manner, and to the like effect, as if the said process had originally been issued out of the Court within the said last-mentioned district.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That all process, actions, pleas, suits, and other proceedings, which have been commenced and returned to the separate several sessions of the District Court, at such places appointed by law for holding thereof, shall be tried at the place in each district where the same were first made returnable.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That the Clerk of the said District Court shall, at each of the places aforesaid, keep a distinct docket and record of such business, returnable as aforesaid, or which may be returned to the session to be held at the said places, respectively, at which places of return the said business shall be finally heard and determined as aforesaid.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That so much of the act to establish the Judicial Courts of the United States as is or may be construed to require the attendance of the Marshals of all the districts at the Supreme Court, shall be, and the same is hereby, repealed; and that the said Court shall be attended during its session by the Marshal of the district only in which the Court shall sit, unless the attendance of the Marshals of other districts shall be required by special order of the said Court.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That, from and after the last day of September next, the District Court for the State of Kentucky shall be held in the town of Frankfort—anything in any former act to the contrary notwithstanding.

Approved, June 9, 1794.

An Act laying Duties on property sold at auction.

Be it enacted, &c., That, from and after the thirtieth day of September next, there shall be levied, collected, and paid, for the use of the United States, upon all sales by way of auction, as herein after described, which shall be made within the United States, the respective rates and duties following, to wit: The sum of one-fourth part of a dollar for every hundred dollars of the purchase money arising by sale at auction, of any interest, right, or estate, in any lands, tenements, or hereditaments, and of any utensils in husbandry and farming stock, ships and vessels, and the sum of one-half of a dollar, for every hundred dollars of the purchase money, arising by sale at auction, of all other goods, chattels, rights, and credits whatsoever, and at the same rate for any greater or lesser sum, except as hereinafter excepted: The said respective rates and duties to be paid by the auctioneer or person making such sales at auction, out of the moneys arising from each and every such sale: Provided, always, That nothing in this act contained shall extend to any sale or sales by auction, of estates, goods, or effects, made pursuant to, or in execution of, any rule, order, decree, sentence, or judgment, of any Court of the United States, or of either of them; or made in virtue, or by force of any distress for rent, or other cause, for which a distress is allowed by law; or made in consequence of any bankruptcy, or insolvency, pursuant to any law concerning bankruptcies or insolvencies; or made in consequence of any general assignment of property and effects, for the benefit of creditors; or made by or on behalf of executors or administrators; or made of the proceeds of the land, upon the land where such produce was raised; or made of any farming utensils, stock, or household furniture, by persons removing from the place of such sale of such farming utensils, stock, or household furniture, shall not exceed two hundred dollars; or made pursuant to the directions of any law of the United States, or of either of them, touching the collection of any tax or duty; or disposal by auction of public property of the United States, or of any State; nor to any such sale or sales by auction of ships, their tackle, apparel, and furniture, or the cargoes thereof, which shall be wrecked or stranded within the United States, and sold for the benefit of the insurers or proprietors thereof.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That no person, after the said thirtieth day of September next, shall exercise the trade or business of an auctioneer, by the selling of any estates, goods or effects whatsoever by auction, or any other mode of sale, whereby the best or highest bidder is deemed to be the purchaser, unless such person shall have a license, or other special authority, continuing in force pursuant to some law of a State, or issued pursuant to the directions of this act, on pain of forfeiting, for every such sale at auction, the sum of four hundred dollars, together with the sums or duties payable by this act upon the estates, goods, or effects so sold: Provided, however, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to require a license for the sale at auction of any estate, goods, chatties, or other thing, which by this act are exempted from duty.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That every person, who, before the said thirtieth day of September next, shall have a license or special authority, pursuant to any law of any State, for exercising the said trade or business of an auctioneer, shall, before or upon the said day, and every person, who, after the said day, shall have such special license or authority, shall, within thirty days after the obtaining or receiving of the same, give notice thereof in writing, under his hand, to the office of inspector nearest to the place where he shall carry on or intend to carry on the said trade or business of an auctioneer, specifying in such notice the date or commencement of such license, or other special authority, the term for which the same was granted or given, by whom, and by what law of a State, the same was granted or given; and shall also give bond to the United States, in the sum of one thousand five hundred dollars, to be taken by the officer, at whose office of the revenue, continuing in force, shall and may retain, in order to the payment of the duties hereby imposed, all such sum and sums of money as shall be due and payable upon any estates, goods, or effects, by him sold at auction, as aforesaid, according to the true intent and meaning of this act.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That the accounts to be rendered, and the duties to be from time to time paid as aforesaid, by any auctioneer, shall be rendered and paid to the inspector of the revenue, within whose survey such auctioneer shall exercise his said trade or business, or to his deputy duly appointed under his hand and seal, and such auctioneer shall make oath or affirmation, according to the best of his knowledge and belief, to the truth of every account which he shall render before the officer or person to whom such account shall be rendered, and who is hereby authorized to administer the said oath or affirmation; in default of which such account shall not be deemed to be duly rendered, according to the condition of the bond of such auctioneer. And to the end that such accounts may be accurately kept and rendered, it is hereby made the duty of every auctioneer to enter, from day to day, as of ten as any sale shall be made, in a book, or on a paper to be kept by him for that purpose, the amount and particulars of the respective sales by him made; which book or paper shall, at all reasonable times, upon request made, be submitted for examination to the officer of inspection, within whose survey or division such auctioneer shall be, on pain of forfeiting, for every refusal to comply with such request, the sum of five hundred dollars.

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That if it shall appear to the satisfaction of the supervisor, within whose district he shall be, that an auctioneer hath acted agreeably to the condition of the bond which he shall have given, and to the directions of this act, during the time to which his said bond shall relate, the same having expired, then, and in every such case, the said supervisor shall cause such bond to be delivered up; but in case no such account shall be delivered, as hereinbefore mentioned, or if it shall appear, that any such account was not truly made, or that the party hath acted in any other respect contrary to the true intent and meaning of his bond and of this act, it shall be the duty of such supervisor of the revenue to cause such bond to be prosecuted according to law, and in case of a verdict or judgment against the defendant, he shall, afterwards, upon every sale by him of any estates, goods, or effects, at auction, be liable to all the penalties, which may be incurred by this act, for acting as an auctioneer without license.

Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That if any sale at auction of any lands, tenements, or hereditaments, shall be, or become void, by reason of defect of title, the supervisor of the revenue, within whose district such sale shall be, is hereby authorized and required, upon due and sufficient proof of such sale being or becoming void, for the reason aforesaid, to cause to be remitted the duty or duties thereupon otherwise payable according to this act.

Acts of Congress.

Sec. 9. And be it further enacted, That every auctioneer, out of the proceeds of the duties which he shall retain and pay as aforesaid, shall be allowed a commission of one per centum, upon the amount thereof, for his trouble in and about the same.

Sec. 10. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for the President of the United States, and he is hereby empowered, to make such allowances for compensations to the officers of inspection employed in the collection of the duties aforesaid, and for incidental expenses, as he shall judge reasonable, not exceeding in the whole two and a half per centum of the total amount of the said duties collected.

Sec. 11. And be it further enacted, That if any person shall wilfully swear or affirm falsely, touching any matter hereinbefore required to be verified by oath or affirmation, he shall suffer the pains and penalties which, by law, are prescribed for wilful and corrupt perjury; and, if an officer, shall forfeit his office, and be incapable of afterwards holding any office under the United States.

Sec. 12. And be it further enacted, That all fines, penalties, and forfeitures, which shall be incurred by force of this act, shall and may be sued for and recovered, in the name of the United States, or of the supervisor of the revenue, within whose district any such fine, penalty, or forfeiture, shall have been incurred, by bill, plaint, or information; one moiety thereof to the use of the United States, and the other moiety thereof to the use of the person, who, if an officer of inspection, shall first discover, if other than an officer of inspection, shall first inform of the cause, matter, or thing, whereby any such fine, penalty, or forfeiture, shall have been incurred. And where the cause of action or complaint shall arise or accrue more than fifty miles distant from the nearest place by law established for the holding of a District Court, within the district in which the same shall arise or accrue, such suit and recovery may be had before any Court of the State, holden within the said district, having jurisdiction in like cases.

Sec. 13. And be it further enacted, That this act shall continue and be in force for the term of two years, and from thence to the end of the next session of Congress, and no longer.

Approved, June 9, 1794.

RESOLUTIONS.

Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States be authorized to employ, as despatch-boats, such of the revenue cutters of the United States, as the public exigencies may require.

Approved, March 20, 1794.

Resolved, &c., That an embargo be laid on all ships and vessels in the ports of the United States, whether already cleared out, or not, bound to any foreign port or place, for the term of thirty days; and that no clearances be furnished, during that time, to any ship or vessel bound to such foreign port or place, except ships or vessels under the immediate direction of the President of the United States: And that the President of the United States be authorized to give such instructions to the revenue officers of the United States, as shall appear best adapted for carrying the said resolution into full effect.

Approved, March 26, 1794.

Resolved, &c., That, during the continuance of the present embargo, no registered vessel, having on board goods, wares, or merchandise, shall be allowed to depart from one port of the United States to any other port within the same, unless the master, owner, consignee, or factor, shall first give bond with one or more sureties to the Collector of the district from which she is about to depart, in a sum of double the value of the vessel and cargo, that the said goods, wares, or merchandise, shall be relanded in some port of the United States; which bond, and also a certificate from the Collector of the district, where the same may be relanded, shall, by the Collectors respectively, be transmitted to the Secretary of the Treasury. That the several Collectors be prohibited from granting a clearance to any foreign ship or vessel, in any case whatever, during the continuance of the present embargo; and all armed vessels, possessing public commissions from any foreign Power, (letters of marque excepted,) are to be considered as not liable to the embargo.

Approved, April 2, 1794.

Resolved, &c., That the present embargo be continued, and every regulation concerning the same, shall be in full force until the twenty-fifth day of May next.

Approved, April 18, 1794.

Resolved, &c., That the President of the United States be authorized to direct clearances to be granted to any ships or vessels belonging to citizens of the United States, which are now loaded, bound from any port in the United States, for any port beyond the Cape of Good Hope; any thing in the resolution for laying the embargo, to the contrary notwithstanding: Provided, That, before the Collector of either of the districts of the United States, shall grant clearances, or any such vessel shall sail, the owners thereof shall give sufficient security, to the satisfaction of such Collector, that she shall not unlade her cargo, or any part thereof, at any port or place, previous to her arrival at the Cape of Good Hope.

Approved, May 7, 1794.

Resolved, &c., That the Secretary of the Department of War be, and he is hereby directed to make out an exact list of the names of each person returned to him, as invalid pensioners, by the Judges of the Circuit Courts of the United States (signing themselves as Commissioners,) under the act of Congress, passed the twenty-third of March, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-two, entitled "An act to provide for the settlement of claims of widows and orphans, barred by the limitations heretofore established, and to regulate the claims to invalid pensions," and return to the Judge of each district one copy of such list, stating particularly the district from which each person was returned, and that all are by Congress directed not to be entered on the pension list. And the said Secretary is further directed to return to each District Judge a list of the names of all such persons as have been returned as invalid pensioners by the District Judges, under the act of Congress, passed the twenty-eighth of February, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-three, entitled "An act to regulate claims to invalid pensions," distinguishing those who have been placed on the pension list, and those who have not been placed on the same, by reason of their testimony being incomplete, stating, particularly, the legal requisites wanting in the evidence of each; and naming such of them whose evidence of leaving service is not lodged in his office. And the Judges of the several District Courts, upon receipt of the above described lists and statements, from the Secretary for the Department of War, are hereby directed forthwith to publish the same, in one or more of the newspapers published in their respective districts, adding to such publication the time when the act regulating the claims to invalid pensions expires.

Approved, June 9, 1794.

Resolved, &c., That it shall be the duty of the respective Clerks of the several District Courts of the United States, to return true copies of the tables of fees payable in the Supreme or Superior Courts of the States in which such Clerk resides, to the Attorney General of the United States, on or before the fifth day of December next.

Approved, June 9, 1794.

Resolved, &c., That the following article be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States, as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States; which when ratified by three-fourths of the said Legislatures shall be valid as a part of the said Constitution, viz:

The judicial power of the United States, shall not be construed to extend to any suit in law or equity, commenced or prosecuted against one of the United States by citizens of another State, or by citizens or subjects of any foreign State.

Acts of Congress.

ACTS PASSED AT THE SECOND SESSION.

An Act to authorize the President to call out and station a corps of Militia in the four Western counties of Pennsylvania for a limited time.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That a force not exceeding two thousand five hundred non-commissioned officers, musicians, and privates, to be composed of the militia of the United States, be called forth and stationed in the four Western counties of Pennsylvania, if, in the judgment of the President, the same shall be deemed necessary to suppress unlawful combinations, and to cause the laws to be duly executed: Provided, That the term of service of any one quota of the militia to be called into actual service, pursuant to this act, shall not exceed three months after they shall have arrived at the place of rendezvous.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby authorized, if, in his judgment, it should be deemed expedient, to direct voluntary enlistments of any of the militia of the United States, in lieu of all or any part of the force herein authorized to be called forth, for the purposes aforesaid, for a term of service not exceeding thirty days after the commencement of the next session of Congress.

FREDERICK A. MUHLENBERG,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

JOHN ADAMS,

Vice President of the United States, and President of the Senate.

Approved, November 9, 1794.

G. WASHINGTON,

President of the United States.

An Act extending the privilege of franking to James White, the Delegate from the Territory of the United States South of the river Ohio, and making provision for his compensation.

Be it enacted, &c., That James White, the Delegate to Congress from the Territory of the United States South of the river Ohio, be entitled to the privilege of sending and receiving letters free of postage, on the same terms and under the same restrictions as are provided for the members of the Senate and of the House of Representatives of the United States by the act, entitled "An act to establish the Post Office and Post Roads within the United States."

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the said James White shall receive for his traveling expenses and attendance in Congress the same compensation as is or may be allowed by law to the members of the House of Representatives of the United States, to be certified and paid in like manner.

Approved, December 3, 1794.

An Act to amend and explain the twenty-second section of "the Act establishing the Judicial Courts of the United States."

Whereas, by the twenty-second section of the act, entitled "An Act to establish the Judicial Courts of the United States," it is provided that "Every Justice or Judge signing a citation on any writ of error, shall take good and sufficient security that the plaintiff in error shall prosecute his writ to effect, and answer all damages and costs, if he fail to make his plea good." And whereas doubts have arisen as to the extent of the security to be required in certain cases:

Be it enacted, &c., That the security to be required and taken on the signing of a citation on any writ of error, which shall not be a supersedeas and stay execution, shall be only to such an amount, as, in the opinion of the Justice or Judge taking the same, shall be sufficient to answer all such costs, as, upon an affirmance of the judgment or decree, may be adjudged or decreed to the respondent in error.

Approved, December 12, 1794.

An act authorizing a Loan of two millions of dollars.

Be it enacted, &c., That the President of the United States be empowered to borrow, on behalf of the United States, any sum not exceeding five million of dollars, at an interest not exceeding five per cent, per annum, reimbursable at the pleasure of the United States, to be applied to such public purposes as are authorized by law, and to be repaid out of the duties on impost and tonnage, to the end of the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-five.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for the Bank of the United States, and the said Bank hereby is authorized and empowered to loan the said sum, or any part thereof.

Approved, December 18, 1794.

An Act making appropriations for the support of the Military Establishment for the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety five, and for the expenses of the Militia lately called into the service of the United States.

Be it enacted, &c., That there be appropriated for the pay, subsistence, forage, and other expenses attending the militia in their late expedition to the Western counties of Pennsylvania, a sum not exceeding one million one hundred and twenty-two thousand five hundred and sixty-nine dollars and one cent; that is to say—For the pay, subsistence, and forage of the general staff, eighteen thousand six hundred and eighty-one dollars and thirty-four cents: For the pay, subsistence, and forage of the militia of New Jersey, eighty-eight thousand seven hundred and eighteen dollars and twenty-five cents: For the pay, subsistence, and forage of the militia of Pennsylvania, two hundred

For the annual allowance for the education of Hugh Mercer, son of the late Major General Mercer, by the act of Congress of the second of March, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-three, four hundred dollars.

For the discharge of such demands against the United States, on account of the civil department, not otherwise provided for, as shall have been ascertained and admitted in due course of settlement at the Treasury, and which are of a nature, according to the usage thereof, to require payment in specie, three thousand dollars.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That for the maintenance and support of light-houses, beacons, buoys, public piers, and stakes of channels, bars, and shoals, there shall be appropriated a sum of money not exceeding twenty thousand dollars; and for making good a deficiency of appropriation for building a light-house at Baldhead, there shall be appropriated a sum not exceeding four thousand dollars.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That for discharging certain miscellaneous claims upon the United States, there shall be appropriated a sum of money not exceeding eight thousand and four dollars and thirteen cents, that is to say: For making good to the Bank of the United States loss and insurance on shipments of money for, and on account of the United States, and for loss on silver and gold received from the collectors at Wilmington and Edenton, one thousand four hundred and twelve dollars and ninety-three cents; for paying Joseph Stretch, sole administrator of Joseph Wright, deceased, for modelling a likeness and cutting two dies, in conformity to a resolution of Congress of the twenty-fourth of September, one thousand seven hundred and seventy-nine, two hundred and thirty-three dollars and thirty-three cents; for the payment of a balance due to Arthur St. Clair, pursuant to an act of Congress of the thirty-first of May, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-four, one thousand and fifty-seven dollars and eighty-seven cents; for an allowance to the widow and orphan children of Robert Forsyth, late marshal of the district of Georgia, pursuant to an act of June the seventh, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-four, two thousand dollars; for defraying the expense of publishing lists of invalid pensioners, in compliance with the resolution of Congress of the ninth of June, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-four, eight hundred dollars; for defraying the expense of sundry expresses to and from the collectors of the revenue, in relation to the embargo, five hundred dollars; for the discharge of such miscellaneous demands against the United States, other than those on account of the civil department, not otherwise provided for, and which shall have been ascertained and admitted in due course of settlement at the Treasury, and which are of a nature, according to the usage thereof, to require payment in specie, two thousand dollars.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That the several appropriations hereinbefore made shall be paid and discharged out of the fund of six hundred thousand dollars referred by the act making provision for the Debt of the United States.

Approved, January 2, 1795.

An Act to regulate the pay of the non-commissioned officers, musicians, and privates of the Militia of the United States, when called into actual service, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, &c., That, from and after the passing of this act, the allowance of bounty, clothing, and pay, to the non-commissioned officers, musicians, and privates of the infantry, artillery, and cavalry of the militia of the United States, when called into actual service, shall be at the rate per month as follows: Each sergeant-major and quartermaster-sergeant, nine dollars; each drum and fifer, eight dollars and thirty-three cents; each sergeant, eight dollars; each corporal, drummer, fifer, and trumpeter, seven dollars and thirty-three cents; each farrier, saddler, and artificer, (included as a private,) eight dollars; each gunner, bombardier, and private, six dollars and sixty-six cents.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That, in addition to the monthly pay, there shall be allowed to each officer, non-commissioned officer, musician, and private of the cavalry, for the use of his horse, arms, and accoutrements, and for the risk thereof, except of horses killed in action, forty cents per day; and to each non-commissioned officer, musician, and private, twenty-five cents per day, in lieu of rations and forage, when they shall provide the same.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That, whenever the militia shall be called into the actual service of the United States, their pay shall be deemed to commence from the day of their appearing at the places of battalion, regimental, or brigade rendezvous—allowing to each non-commissioned officer, musician, and private soldier, a day's pay and rations for every fifteen miles from his home to such place of rendezvous, and the same allowance for traveling home from the place of discharge.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That, in addition to the pay heretofore authorized by law, there shall be allowed and paid to the non-commissioned officers, musicians, and privates of the militia lately called forth into the actual service of the United States, on an expedition to Fort Pitt, such sums as shall, with the pay heretofore by law established, be equal to the allowance respectively provided in the first and second sections of this act: Provided, nevertheless, That the compensations made by any State to the militia called forth from such State, shall be deemed to be included in the additional allowance authorized by this act; and such State shall be entitled to receive from the Treasury of the United States, such sums as they shall have paid or allowed to the non-commissioned officers, musicians, and privates over and above the pay heretofore allowed by law, and not exceeding the additional allowance granted by this act.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That, for the completing and better supporting the Military Establishment of the United States, as provided by the act, entitled "An act making further and more effectual provision for the protection of the frontiers of the United States," there shall be allowed and paid, from and after the first day of January, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-five, to each non-commissioned officer, musician, and private now in service, or hereafter to be enlisted, the additional pay of one dollar per month, during the terms of their respective enlistments; and to each soldier now in the service of the United States, or discharged therefrom subsequent to the third day of March last, who shall re-enlist after the first day of January next, an additional bounty of eight dollars—making the entire bounty sixteen dollars; and to each person not now in the Army of the United States, or discharged, as above, who shall enlist after the said first day of January next, an additional bounty of six dollars—making the entire bounty fourteen dollars: but the payment of four dollars of each additional bounty hereby granted, shall be deferred until the soldier enlisting shall join the regiment or corps in which he is to serve.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That, to those in the military service of the United States, who are or shall be employed on the Western frontiers, there shall be allowed, during the time of their being so employed, two ounces of flour or bread, and two ounces of beef or pork, in addition to each of their rations, and half a pint of salt in addition to every hundred of their rations.

Approved, January 2, 1795.

An Act authorizing the transfer of the stock standing to the credit of certain States.

Be it enacted, &c., That at any time within two years from the passing of this act, transfers shall and may be authorized, of so much of the stock standing to the credit of any State, pursuant to the report of the Commissioners for settling accounts between the United States and individual States; and the act passed thereto, entitled "An act making provision for the payment of the interest on the balances due to certain States, upon a final settlement of the accounts between the United States and the individual States," to creditors of such State who were such prior to the first day of July, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-three, as may be necessary to satisfy their respective demands: Provided, That no such transfer shall be made but with the consent of the said State and its creditors.

Approved, January 2, 1795.

An Act providing for the payment of certain instalments of Foreign Debts, and of the third instalment due on a Loan made of the Bank of the United States.

Be it enacted, &c., That the President of the United States be, and he hereby is, authorized and empowered to cause any instalments of the Foreign Debts which may fall due in the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-five, and also the third instalment due on a Loan made of the Bank of the United States, in pursuance of the eleventh section of the act for incorporating the subscribers to the said Bank, to be paid out of the proceeds of any Foreign Loans heretofore made.

Approved, January 8, 1795.

An Act for reviving certain suits and process which have been discontinued in the District Court of Pennsylvania.

Be it enacted, &c., That all suits and process which were pending in the District Court of Pennsylvania, which, by law, ought to have been holden on the third Monday in November last, and which were discontinued by the failure to hold the same; and all suits and process which were commenced for the said Court, or returnable thereto; and, also, all suits and process which were pending in any special Court of the said district, and discontinued by failure to hold the adjournment thereof, on the day appointed, at any time since the last day of July last, be, and they are hereby, revived; and hereby day is given to all the suits and process aforesaid, in the District Court next by law to be holden in the same district; and the same proceedings may be had at the same last mentioned Court, in all the suits and process aforesaid, as by law might have been had at the Courts, respectively, in which the same were pending, or to which the same were returnable.

Approved, January 28, 1795.

An Act further extending the time for receiving on Loan the Domestic Debt of the United States.

Be it enacted, &c., That the term for receiving on loan that part of the Domestic Debt of the United States which has not been subscribed in pursuance of the provisions heretofore made by law for that purpose, be and the same is hereby further extended until the thirty-first day of December next, on the same terms and conditions as are contained in the act, entitled "An act making provision for the Debt of the United States;" Provided, That the books for receiving the said subscriptions shall be opened only at the Treasury of the United States.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That such of the creditors of the United States as have not subscribed and shall not subscribe to the said loan, shall nevertheless receive during the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-five, a rate per centum on the amount of such of their demands as have been registered or as shall be registered at the Treasury conformable to the directions in the act, entitled "An act making provision for the Debt of the United States," equal to the interest which would be payable to them as subscribing creditors.

Approved, January 28, 1795.

An Act supplementary to the several acts imposing duties on goods, wares, and merchandise imported into the United States.

Whereas difficulties have arisen in ascertaining the duties on certain articles imported into the United States, and further provisions for securing the collection of the impost duties are found necessary:

Be it enacted, &c., That in lieu of the present duties, there shall be levied, collected and paid upon all printing types, which after the last day of March next, shall be imported into the United States, in ships or vessels of the United States, at the rate of ten per centum, and upon all grandoleas, at the rate of twenty per centum ad valorem; that, after the said last day of March next, the present duties payable upon clayed sugars shall cease, and there shall be paid upon all white clayed or white powdered sugars, three cents per pound, and upon all other clayed or powdered sugars, one and a half cent per pound; upon Malaga wine, twenty cents; upon Burgundy and Champagne, forty cents per gallon.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That, after the said last day of March, tea, commonly called imperial, gunpowder, or gomee, shall pay the same duties as hyson teas; and where any entire article is, by any law of the United States, made subject to the payment of duties, the parts thereof, when imported separately, shall be subject to the payment of the same rate of duties.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That, after the said last day of March, the valuation of all goods, wares, and merchandise, subject to the payment of duties ad valorem, shall be made upon the actual cost at the place of exportation, including all charges, (commissions, outside packages and insurance only excepted,) that the duty on any wines imported into the United States shall not be less than ten cents per gallon, and that bottles in which any liquor is imported, shall be subject to the payment of the like duty as empty bottles.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That the duties upon all goods, wares, and merchandise, imported into the United States, after the said last day of March, (where the sum payable by one person or copartnership shall amount to more than fifty dollars,) shall be payable upon all articles, the produce of the West Indies, (salt excepted,) the one-half in three, and the other half in six calendar months; and on all goods, wares, and merchandise, imported from Europe, (wines, salt and teas excepted,) one-third in eight months, and one-third in ten months, and the remaining third in twelve months from the time of each respective importation.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That, in respect to the aforesaid duties, and the duties heretofore imposed on goods, wares, and merchandise, imported into the United States, there shall be an addition of ten per centum to the several rates of duties when imported in ships or vessels not of the United States, except in cases where such additional duty has been before specially laid on any goods, wares, or merchandise, imported in such ships or vessels.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That the duties aforesaid shall be collected in like manner, and under the same regulations, restrictions, and provisions, and subject to the like appropriations as goods, wares, and merchandise, imported into the United States, are now subject to.

Approved, January 29, 1795.

An Act making further provision in cases of drawbacks.

Whereas the allowance of drawbacks on goods, wares, and merchandise, imported into the United States, is now limited to such as are exported from districts into which the same are imported, and great loss and inconvenience are experienced from such limitation and further provision, in respect to goods, wares, or merchandise, entitled to drawback, is deemed necessary:

Be it enacted, &c., That after the last day of

Acts of Congress.

March next, any goods, wares, and merchandise, imported into the United States, may be exported from any of the ports at which ships and vessels from the Cape of Good Hope, or from any place beyond the same, are admitted to make entry, and entitled to the same drawback of the duties as goods, wares, and merchandise, exported from the districts in which they are imported, are now entitled to: Provided, nevertheless, That such goods, wares, and merchandise, shall not be entitled to such drawback, unless they shall be accompanied by a certificate from the collector of the district into which they were imported, specifying the marks, numbers, and descriptions, of the casks or packages, with the names of the master and vessel in which, the time when, and the place from whence, they were imported; and where the articles pay duties by weight or measure, the quantity in each; and in all cases the amount of the duties paid or secured thereon.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That in order to entitle any person to such certificate, he or they shall make out an entry of all such goods, wares, and merchandise, specifying the marks, numbers, and descriptions, of the casks, or packages, and their contents, the names of the master and vessel in which, the time when, and the place from which they were imported; the names of the master and vessel in which they are intended to be laden, and the district in the United States to which they are destined; and shall moreover make oath or affirmation to the truth of such entry; which requisites being complied with, and the collector satisfied with the truth thereof, he shall grant such certificate, and such goods, wares, and merchandise, shall be entered with the collector of the district into which they shall be brought from the place of their importation, previous to the landing or unloading thereof.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That, after the last day of March next, it shall be lawful for the importer, or exporter, of any liquors in casks, coffee in casks, or other packages, or any unrefined sugars, to fill up the casks or packages out of other casks or packages included in the original importation, into new casks or packages, in case the original cask or package shall be so injured as to be rendered unfit for exportation, and under the inspection of the inspector of the port from which such liquors, coffee, or unrefined sugars, are intended to be exported.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That when any goods, wares, or merchandise, entitled to drawback, shall be entered for exportation from any other district than the one into which they were imported, the person intending to export the same, besides producing the certificate hereinbefore directed, shall make an entry in like manner, and the goods, wares, and merchandise, therein expressed, shall undergo the same examination as is by law required relative to goods, wares, and merchandise, entitled to drawback, and intended to be exported from the place of original importation.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That for all goods, wares, and merchandise, entitled to drawback, which, after the last day of March next, back, which, after the last day of March next, shall be exported from the district into which they were originally imported, the exporter or exporters shall be entitled to receive from the collector of such district a debenture or debentures, for the amount of the drawback to which such goods, wares, or merchandise, are entitled, payable at the same time or times respectively on which the duties on the said goods, wares, or merchandise, shall become due, except the same or any part thereof has been paid, or shall become payable in less than three months; in which case such debenture shall be payable in three months: And it shall be the duty of the said collectors to discharge such debentures, at the time they become due, out of any public money in their hands. And where goods, wares, and merchandise, are exported from any other district than the one into which they were imported, it shall be the duty of the collector of such district to grant to the exporter a certificate expressing that such goods, wares, and merchandise, were exported from his district, with the marks, numbers, and description, of the packages and their contents, the name of the vessel on which they were laden, the name of the commander, and the port for which they were cleared out, and the amount of the drawback to which they are entitled. And such certificate shall entitle the possessor thereof to receive from the collector of the said district, with whom the duties on the said goods, wares, and merchandise, were paid, or secured, a debenture or debentures for the drawback expressed in the said certificates, payable at the same time, and in like manner, as is hereinafter directed for debentures on goods, wares, and merchandise, exported from the place of their first importation: Provided, nevertheless, That the collector aforesaid may refuse to grant such debenture or debentures, in case it shall appear to him that any error has arisen, or any fraud has been committed; and in case of such refusal, if the debenture or debentures claimed shall exceed one hundred dollars, it shall be his duty to represent the case to the Comptroller of the Treasury, who shall determine whether such debenture or debentures shall be granted or not: And provided always, That in no case of an exportation by the original importer shall a drawback be paid until the duties on the importation thereof shall have been first received.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That before the receipt of any such debenture, in case of exportation from the district of original importation, and in case of exportation from any other district, before the receipt of any such certificate, the person applying for the same shall give bond with one or more sureties, to the satisfaction of the collector who is to grant the debenture, or the certificate, as the case may be, in a sum equal to double the amount of the sum for which such debenture or certificate is granted, conditioned to produce to such collector, like proof and certificates of the delivery of such goods, wares, or merchandise, at some place without the United States, as are now required by law for obtaining the drawback on exportation, within one year, in case such goods have been shipped to any part of Europe or America, and within two years, if to any part of Asia or Africa: Provided, nevertheless, That when it shall be made to appear to the satisfaction of the collector, to whom such certificates are directed to be returned, that such certificates could not be obtained, the exporter or exporters shall be permitted to offer such other testimony, as to the landing or loss of the goods, wares, and merchandise, as he may have; which proof shall be referred to the Comptroller of the Treasury, who shall have power and authority to admit the same if he shall deem it satisfactory, and to direct the collector to cancel the bond accordingly.

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That so much of the act, entitled "An act to provide more effectually for the collection of the duties imposed by law on goods, wares, and merchandise, imported into the United States, and on the tonnage of ships or vessels," as extends the credits on bonds given for duties on account of the drawback on goods exported, shall, after the said last day of March next, be repealed: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to extend to any allowance made upon goods, wares, and merchandise, imported before the said last day of March next.

Approved, January 29, 1793.

An Act in addition to the act, entitled "An act to regulate the pay of the non-commissioned officers, musicians, and privates, of the Militia of the United States, when called into actual service, and for other purposes."

Be it enacted, &c., That the augmentation of bounty authorized by the fifth section of the act, entitled "An act to regulate the pay of the non-commissioned officers, musicians, and privates, of the Militia of the United States, when called into actual service, and for other purposes," shall be allowed and paid to such recruits as shall have enlisted after the passing of the said act, or as shall hereafter enlist, in like manner as is by the said act provided in cases of enlistment after the first day of January next.

Approved, January 29, 1793.

An act to establish a uniform rule of Naturalization, and to repeal the act heretofore passed.

For carrying into complete effect the power given by the Constitution to establish a uniform rule of naturalization throughout the United States:

Be it enacted, &c., That any alien, being a free white person, may be admitted to become a citizen of the United States, or any of them, on the following conditions, and not otherwise:

First. He shall have declared, on oath or affirmation, before the Supreme, Superior, District, or Circuit Court of some one of the States, or of the Territories Northwest or South of the river Ohio, or a Circuit or District Court of the United States, three years, at least, before his admission, that it was, bona fide, his intention to become a citizen of the United States, and to renounce forever all allegiance and fidelity to any foreign prince, potentate, State, or sovereignty whatever, and particularly by name, the prince, potentate, State, or sovereignty whereof such alien may, at the time, be a citizen or subject.

Secondly. He shall, at the time of his application to be admitted, declare, on oath or affirmation, before some one of the Courts aforesaid, that he has resided within the United States five years at least, and within the State or Territory where such Court is at the time held, one year at least, that he will support the Constitution of the United States; and that he doth absolutely and entirely renounce and abjure all allegiance and fidelity to every foreign prince, potentate, State, or sovereignty whatever, and particularly, by name, the prince, potentate, State, or sovereignty, whereof he was before a citizen or subject; which proceedings shall be recorded by the clerk of the Court.

Thirdly. The Court admitting such alien shall be satisfied that he has resided within the limits and under the jurisdiction of the United States, five years; and it shall further appear to their satisfaction that, during that time, he has behaved as a man of a good moral character, attached to the principles of the Constitution of the United States, and well disposed to the good order and happiness of the same.

Fourthly. In case the alien applying to be admitted to citizenship shall have borne any hereditary title, or been of any of the orders of nobility, in the Kingdom or State from which he came, he shall, in addition to the above requisites, make an express renunciation of his title or order of nobility, in the Court to which his application shall be made; which renunciation shall be recorded in the said Court.

Sec. 2. Provided always, and be it further enacted, That any alien, now residing within the limits and under the jurisdiction of the United States, may be admitted to become a citizen, on his declaring, on oath or affirmation, in some one of the Courts aforesaid, that he has resided two years, at least, within and under the jurisdiction of the same, and one year, at least, within the State or Territory where such Court is at the time held; that he will support the Constitution of the United States; and that he doth absolutely and entirely renounce and abjure all allegiance and fidelity to any foreign prince, potentate, State, or sovereignty, whatever, and particularly, by name, the prince, potentate, State, or sovereignty, whereof he was before a citizen or subject; and moreover, on its appearing to the satisfaction of the Court, that during the said term of two years, he has behaved as a man of good moral character, attached to the Constitution of the United States, and well disposed to the good order and happiness of the same; and, when the alien applying for admission to citizenship shall have borne any hereditary title, or been of any of the orders of nobility in the Kingdom or State from which he came, on his, moreover, making in the Court an express renunciation of his title or order of nobility, before he shall be entitled to such admission; all of which proceedings, required in this proviso to be performed in the Court, shall be recorded by the clerk thereof.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the children of persons duly naturalized, dwelling within the United States, and being under the age of twenty-one years, at the time of such naturalization, and the children of citizens of the United States, born out of the limits and jurisdiction of the United States, shall be considered as citizens of the United States: Provided, That the right of citizenship shall not descend to persons whose fathers have never been resident in the United States: Provided also, That no person heretofore proscribed by any State, or who has been legally convicted of having joined the army of Great Britain, during the late war, shall be admitted a citizen as aforesaid, without the consent of the Legislature of the State in which such person was proscribed.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the act entitled "An act to establish a uniform rule of naturalization," passed the twenty-sixth day of March, one thousand seven hundred and ninety, be, and the same is hereby repealed.

Approved, January 29, 1795.

An Act to amend the Act, entitled "An Act making alterations in the Treasury and War Departments."

Be it enacted, &c., That in case of vacancy in the office of Secretary of State, Secretary of the Treasury, or of the Secretary of the Department of War, or of any officer of either of the said Departments, whose appointment is not in the Head thereof, whereby they cannot perform the duties of their said respective offices, it shall be lawful for the President of the United States, in case he shall think it necessary, to authorize any person or persons, at his discretion, to perform the duties of the said respective offices, until a successor be appointed, or such vacancy be filled: Provided, That no one vacancy shall be supplied, in manner aforesaid, for a longer term than six months.

Approved, February 13, 1795.

An Act relative to the compensation of certain officers employed in the collection of the duties of impost and tonnage.

Be it enacted, &c., That, in lieu of the commissions heretofore by law established, there shall be allowed to the collectors of the duties of impost and tonnage, on all moneys by them respectively received on account of the duties aforesaid arising on tonnage, and on goods, wares, and merchandise, imported after the last day of March next, as follows, to wit:

To the collectors of the districts of Pennsylvania and New York, three-tenths of one per cent;
To the collector of the district of Boston and Charlestown, and to the collector of the district of Baltimore, five-eighths of one per cent;

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That, from and after the last day of March next, in lieu of the sum heretofore established by law, there shall be paid to each inspector, for every day he shall be actually employed in aid of the customs, a sum not exceeding one dollar and sixty-six cents; and that, instead of the sum heretofore established by law, to be paid for the weighing of every one hundred and twelve pounds, in the districts of Pennsylvania, New York, Boston, Baltimore, and Norfolk, there shall be paid one cent and a half.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That, from and after the last day of March next, it shall be the duty of the several collectors, naval officers, and surveyors, to keep accurate accounts of their official emoluments and expenditures, and the same to transmit, annually, on the last day of December, to the Comptroller of the Treasury, who shall annually lay an abstract of the same before Congress.

Approved, February 14, 1795.

An Act for the reimbursement of a Loan authorized by an Act of the last session of Congress.

Be it enacted, &c., That the Bank of the United States be, and the same is hereby, authorized to lend to the United States, the whole or any part of the sum of eight hundred thousand dollars, (remaining unapplied,) in pursuance of the authority granted to borrow one million of dollars, by the act, entitled "An act making further provision for the expenses attending the intercourse of the United States with foreign nations; and further to continue in force the act, entitled 'An act providing the means of intercourse between the United States and foreign nations.'"

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That, after reserving such sums as may be sufficient to satisfy prior appropriations, there be further appropriated, in aid of the provision heretofore made, out of the proceeds of the duties which have arisen, or may arise, upon cargoes for the conveyance of persons, upon licenses for selling wines and foreign distilled spirituous liquors by retail, upon snuff and refined sugar, and upon property sold at auction; which were imposed by acts passed during the last session, and which may be further continued the present session of Congress; or from the proceeds of such duties or revenues as may be established in lieu thereof, a sum sufficient to the reimbursement, before the year one thousand eight hundred and one, of any Loan or Loans, which have been, or which may hereafter be made, in virtue of the act aforesaid; and that the faith of the United States be, and the same is hereby, pledged to make good any deficiency of the said duties.

Approved, February 21, 1795.

An Act authorizing the erection of a light-house near the entrance of Georgetown Harbor, in the State of South Carolina.

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, required to cause to be erected, as soon as may be, a light-house, near the entrance of the harbor of Georgetown, in the State of South Carolina, at such place, when ceded to the United States, as shall be most convenient for the navigation thereof; and that a sum, not exceeding five thousand dollars, be appropriated for the same, out of any moneys not otherwise appropriated: And that a sum, not exceeding one thousand dollars, be appropriated, for placing buoys on certain shoals in Cape Fear river, below the town of Wilmington, in the State of North Carolina.

Approved, February 21, 1795.

An Act supplementary to the Act concerning Invalids.

Be it enacted, &c., That the right any person now has, or may hereafter acquire, to receive a pension, by virtue of the act passed on the 28th day of February, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-three, entitled "An act to regulate the claims to invalid pensions," be considered to commence at the time of completing his testimony before the District Judge or Commissioners, pursuant to the said act: And nothing shall be allowed to any invalid, of the description aforesaid, by way of arrears of pension, antecedent to the date of his completing his testimony as aforesaid: And the pensions allowed under the said act shall be continued to the respective pensioners, during the continuance of their disability.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That no commissioned officer, who has received commutation of half-pay, shall be paid a pension as an invalid, until he shall return his commutation into the Treasury of the United States; except where special provision has been made, in particular cases, for allowing pensions on the return only of certain portions of the commutation.

Approved, February 21, 1795.

An Act to establish the office of Purveyor of Public Supplies.

Be it enacted, &c., That there shall be in the Department of the Treasury, an officer to be designated, "Purveyor of Public Supplies," whose duty shall be, under the direction and supervision of the Secretary of the Treasury, to conduct the procuring and providing of all arms, military and naval stores, provisions, clothing, Indian goods, and generally all articles of supply, requisite for the service of the United States, and whose compensation shall be, a salary of two thousand dollars per annum. And all letters to and from the said officer shall be received and free of postage.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the said officer shall not directly or indirectly be concerned, or interested, in carrying on the business of trade or commerce, or be owner in whole or in part, of any sea vessel, or purchase by himself, or another, in trust for him, public lands, or any other public property, or be concerned in the purchase or disposal of any public securities of any State, or of the United States, or take, or apply to his own use, any emolument, or gain for negotiating or transacting any business in the said Department other than what shall be allowed by law; and if he shall offend against any of the prohibitions of this act, he shall, upon conviction, forfeit to the United States the penalty of three thousand dollars, and may be imprisoned for a term not exceeding five years, and shall be removed from office, and be forever thereafter incapable of holding any office under the United States.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the said officer shall, before he enters on the duties of his office, give bond with sufficient sureties, to be approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, and Comptroller, in the sum of twenty thousand dollars, payable to the United States, with condition for the faithful performance of the duties of his said office; which bond shall be lodged in the office of the Comptroller.

Approved, February 23, 1795.

An Act to continue in force the act "for ascertaining the Fees in Admiralty proceedings in the District Courts of the United States, and for other purposes."

Be it enacted, &c., That the act, entitled "An act to ascertain the Fees in Admiralty proceedings in the District Courts of the United States and for other purposes," be, and is hereby continued in force, for the term of one year from the passing of this act, and from thence to the end of the next session of Congress, and no longer.

Approved, February 26, 1795.

An Act to amend the act, entitled "An act to establish the Post Office and Post Roads within the United States."

Be it enacted, &c., That the following be, and are hereby established, as Post Roads, namely: From Pittstown in the District of Maine, to Wiscasset; and from Hallowell in the said district, to Norridgeworth: From Dover in New Hampshire, through Herwick, to Waterborough Courthouse, and from thence to Kennebec; From Portsmouth, through Dover, Rochester, and Moultonborough, to Plymouth; and from Plymouth to Portsmouth, by New Hampton, Meredith, Gilmanstown, Nottingham and Durham; the post to go and return on the said route alternately: from Fishkill, by Newburg and New Windsor, to Goshen: from Coopers Town, by Butternut Creek and Oxford Academy to Union Town: From Pipers on the post-road from Philadelphia to Bethlehem, by Alexandria, to Pittston of the revenue laws of the United States, the burden of proof shall lie on the claimant only, where probable cause is shown for such prosecution, to be judged of by the Court, before whom the prosecution is had.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That, in all cases in which suits or prosecutions shall be commenced for the recovery of pecuniary penalties prescribed by the laws of the United States, the person or persons, against whom process may be issued, shall be held to special bail, subject to the rules and regulations which prevail in civil suits, in which special bail is required.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That, from and after the last day of May next, there shall be established the following new districts and ports of delivery, to wit: In the State of New York, a district to be called the District of Hudson, which shall include the city of Hudson, and all the waters and shores northward of the said city on Hudson river, and the town of Catskill below the said city; and the said city of Hudson shall be the sole port of entry for the said district: to which shall be annexed the towns or landing places of Catskill, Kinderhook, and Albany, as ports of delivery only; and the collector for the said district shall reside at Hudson; and a surveyor, to reside at Hudson, and another, at Albany, as is now by law established: In the State of Connecticut, a district, to be called the district of Middletown; which shall include the several towns and landing places of Lyme, Saybrook, Killingworth, Hadam, East Hadam, Middletown, Chatham, Weathersfield, Glastenbury, Hartford, East Hartford, Windsor, and East Windsor; of which Middletown shall be the sole port of entry, and the other towns and landing places before named shall be ports of delivery only; and the collector shall reside at Middletown, and there shall be two other surveyors appointed within the said district, one to reside at Hartford, and the other at Saybrook: In the State of Massachusetts, a district to be called the District of Waldoborough; and a collector for the district shall reside at Waldoborough, which shall be the sole port of entry; and to which district shall be annexed the towns of Bristol, Norbleborough, Warren, Thomaston, Cushing, and Camden; also, a place called Ducktrap, as ports of delivery only; and there shall be a surveyor to reside at Thomaston; and all the shores and waters, from the middle of Damascot river to Ducktrap, shall be comprehended within the said district of Waldoborough. And in the district of Portland and Falmouth, Freeport and Harpwell; and also, in the District of Bath, the towns of Georgetown and Brunswick shall be ports of delivery only: And the collectors, to be appointed in conformity with this act, shall each become bound in the sum of four thousand dollars, and each surveyor, in the sum of one thousand dollars, in manner, as is by law provided in like cases. And the same duties, authorities and fees of office, with a similar distribution thereof, shall appertain to those appointments, as are now, in like cases, authorized by law. And the collectors aforesaid shall each receive the same per centage on the amount of all moneys by them respectively received for duties, together with the same yearly allowance, as is allowed by law to the Collector of the District of Fairfield; and each of the surveyors in the district aforesaid shall receive the same yearly allowance as is, or may be allowed by law to the Surveyor of the District of New Haven.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That the master or commander of any ship or vessel, bound from a foreign port or place, to the District of Hudson, or to the District of Bermuda, Hundred and City Point, shall, if bound to the former, first come to, with his ship or vessel, at the city of New York; and if to the latter, after the last day of September next, at Hampton Road or Sewall's Point, and there make report to the Collector of New York, or of Norfolk and Portsmouth, or to the Collector of the port of Hampton, as the case may be, and take on board an inspector of the customs, before he shall proceed to the District of Hudson, or to the District of Bermuda Hundred and City Point: And if bound to any port on Connecticut river, shall take an inspector on board at Saybrook, before proceeding to such port. And if any master or commander shall neglect or refuse to comply with the duty hereby enjoined, or which is enjoined in the third section of the act, entitled "An act to provide more effectually for the collection of the duties imposed by law on goods, wares and merchandise imported into the United States, and on the tonnage of ships or vessels," he shall forfeit a sum not more than five hundred, and not less than fifty dollars: Provided however, That from and after the last day of May next, the restrictions contained in the said third section shall not extend to, and be considered as affecting the several ports or places included within the District of Middle-town; also, the ports of North Yarmouth, Freeport, and Harpwell, in the District of Portland and Falmouth, or the ports of George Town and Brunswick, in the District of Bath.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That the District of Hampton for James River shall only extend up to the east side of Chickahomony river, and from thence upwards to Richmond on the north side, shall be annexed to the District of Bermuda Hundred and City Point; which district shall extend down James River on the south side to Hood's.

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That whenever a seizure, condemnation, and sale of goods, wares, and merchandise, shall hereafter take place, in the United States, and the value thereof shall be less than one hundred dollars, that part of the forfeiture which accrues to the United States, or so much thereof as shall be necessary, shall be applied to the payment of the costs of prosecution.

Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That from and after the last day of May next, whenever an entry shall be made with the collector of any district of any merchandise imported into the United States, subject to duties, by any agent, factor or person, other than the bona fide owner or consignee of such merchandise, it shall be the duty of the collector to increase the penalty of the bond to be given for the duties, the sum of one thousand dollars, and to make it a part of the condition of the said bond, that the bona fide owner or consignee of such merchandise shall, on or before the first day of payment stipulated in said bond, deliver to said collector a full and correct account of the said merchandise imported for him, or on his account, or consigned to his care, in manner and form, as is now required by law in respect to an entry, previous to the landing of any merchandise; which account shall be verified, as in the case of an entry, and by a like oath or affirmation, to be taken and subscribed before any judge of the United States, or the judge of any court of record of a State, or before a collector of the customs of some other district. And in case of the payment of the duties, at the time of entry, by any factor or agent, on the goods entered by him, the collector shall take his bond with security, in the penalty of one thousand dollars, with condition, that the account, verified by the oath or affirmation of the bona fide owner or consignee, in manner as before directed, shall be delivered to the said collector within ninety days.

Sec. 9. And be it further enacted, That all bonds which may be given for any goods, wares, or merchandise exported from the United States after the last day of May next, and on which any drawback of duties, or allowance, shall be payable in virtue of such exportation, shall and may be discharged, and not otherwise, by producing, within one year from the date thereof, if the exportation be made to any part of Europe or America, or within two years, if made to any part of Asia or Africa, a certificate under the hand of the consignee at the foreign port or place, to whom the said goods, wares, or merchandise, shall have been addressed, therein particularly setting forth and describing the articles so exported, with their quantities or amount, and declaring that the same have been delivered from on board the vessel, in which they were exported, at the said place; as also, a certificate under the hand and seal of the consul or agent of the United States residing at the said place, declaring, either that the facts stated in such consignee's certificate are, to his knowledge, true, or that the certificate of such consignee is, in his opinion, deserving of full credit; which certificate of the consignee and consul, or agent, shall, in all cases, as respects the landing or delivery of the said goods, wares, or merchandise, be confirmed by the oath of the master and mate, if living, or in case of their death, by the oath or affirmation of the two principal surviving officers of the vessel, in which the exportation shall be made. And in cases where there shall be no consul or agent of the United States residing at the said place of delivery, the certificate of the consignee before required shall be confirmed by the certificate of two reputable American merchants residing at the said place; or if there be no such American merchants, then by the certificate of two reputable foreign merchants, testifying that the facts stated in such consignee's certificate, are, to their knowledge, true, or that such consignee's certificate is, in their opinion, worthy of full credit; which certificate shall be supported by the oath or affirmation of the master and mate, or other principal officers of the vessel, in the manner before prescribed. And in cases of loss at sea, or by capture, or other unavoidable accident, or when, from the nature of the trade, the proofs and certificates before mentioned are not, and cannot be produced, the exporter or exporters shall be allowed to adduce, to the collector of the port of exportation, such other proofs as they may have, and as the nature of the case will admit; which proofs shall, with a stating of all the circumstances attending the transaction, within the knowledge of such collector, be transmitted to the Comptroller of the Treasury, who shall, if he be satisfied with the truth and validity thereof, have power to direct the bonds of such exporter or exporters to be cancelled.

Approved, February 26, 1795.

An Act for allowing an additional compensation to the Judges of the Districts of Rhode Island and Delaware.

Be it enacted, &c. That there shall be allowed to the Judges of the Districts of Rhode Island and Delaware, each, two hundred dollars yearly, in addition to the compensation heretofore allowed, to commence on the first day of the present year, and to be paid at the Treasury of the United States, in quarterly payments.

Approved, February 27, 1795.

An Act to provide for calling forth the Militia to execute the Laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions, and to repeal the act now in force for those purposes.

Be it enacted, &c. That whenever the United States shall be invaded, or be in imminent danger of invasion, from any foreign nation or Indian tribe, it shall be lawful for the President of the United States to call forth such number of the militia of the State or States most convenient to the place of danger or scene of action, as he may judge necessary to repel such invasion, and to issue his orders for that purpose to such officer or officers of the militia as he shall think proper. And, in case of an insurrection in any State against the Government thereof, it shall be lawful for the President of the United States, on application of the Legislature of such State, or of the Executive, (when the Legislature cannot be convened,) to call forth such number of the militia of any other State or States as may be applied for, as he may judge sufficient to suppress such insurrection.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That whenever the laws of the United States shall be opposed, or the execution thereof obstructed in any State, by combinations too powerful to be suppressed by the ordinary course of judicial proceedings, or by the powers vested in the Marshals and their clerks, or by the President of the United States to call forth the militia of such

Acts of Congress.

State, or of any other State or States, as may be necessary to suppress such combinations, and to cause the laws to be duly executed; and the use of militia so to be called forth, may be continued, if necessary, until the expiration of thirty days after the commencement of the then next session of Congress.

Sec. 3. Provided always, and be it further enacted, That whenever it may be necessary, in the judgment of the President, to use the military force hereby directed to be called forth, the President shall forthwith, by proclamation, command such insurgents to disperse, and retire peaceably to their respective abodes within a limited time.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That the militia employed in the service of the United States shall be subject to the same rules and articles of war as the troops of the United States; and that no officer, non-commissioned officer, or private of the militia, shall be compelled to serve more than three months after his arrival at the place of rendezvous, in any one year, nor more than in due rotation with every other able-bodied man of the same rank in the battalion to which he belongs.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That every officer, non-commissioned officer, or private of the militia, who shall fail to obey the orders of the President of the United States, in any of the cases before recited, shall forfeit a sum not exceeding one year's pay, and not less than one month's pay, to be determined and adjudged by a court-martial; and such officers shall moreover be liable to be cashiered, by sentence of a court-martial, and be incapacitated from holding a commission in the militia for a term not exceeding twelve months, at the discretion of the said court; and such non-commissioned officers and privates shall be liable to be imprisoned, by a like sentence, on failure of payment of the fines adjudged against them, for one calendar month for every five dollars of such fine.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That courts-martial for the trial of militia shall be composed of militia officers only.

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That all fines to be assessed, as aforesaid, shall be certified by the presiding officer of the court-martial, before whom the same shall be assessed, to the Marshal of the District in which the delinquent shall reside, or to one of his deputies, and also to the Supervisor of the Revenue of the same District, who shall record the said certificate in a book, to be kept for that purpose. The said Marshal or his deputy shall forthwith proceed to levy the said fines, with costs, by distress and sale of the goods and chattels of the delinquent; which costs and the manner of proceeding, with respect to the sale of the goods distrained, shall be agreeable to the laws of the State in which the same shall be in other cases of distress. And where any non-commissioned officer or private shall be adjudged to suffer imprisonment, there being no goods or chattels to be found, whereof to levy the said fines, the Marshal of the District or his deputy may commit such delinquent to jail during the term for which he shall be so adjudged to imprison, or until the fine shall be paid, in the same manner as other persons condemned to fine and imprisonment at the suit of the United States may be committed.

Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That the Marshals and their deputies shall pay all such fines by them levied to the Supervisor of the Revenue in the District in which they are collected within two months after they shall have received the same, deducting therefrom five per centum as a compensation for their trouble; and, in case of failure, the same shall be recoverable by action of debt or information in any Court of the United States of the district in which such fines shall be levied, having cognizance thereof, to be sued for, prosecuted, and recovered, in the name of the Supervisor of the District, with interest and costs.

Sec. 9. And be it further enacted, That the Marshals of the several Districts and their deputies shall have the same powers, in executing the laws of the United States, as Sheriffs and their deputies in the several States have, by law, in executing the laws of the respective States.

Sec. 10. And be it further enacted, That the act, entitled "An act to provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions," passed the second day of May, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-two, shall be and the same is hereby repealed.

Approved, February 28, 1795.

An Act to continue in force, for a limited time, the acts therein mentioned.

Be it enacted, &c. That the act, entitled "An act declaring the consent of Congress to an act of the State of Maryland, passed the twenty-eighth of December, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-three, for the appointment of a Health Officer;" and also the act, entitled "An act supplementary to the act for the establishment and support of light-houses, beacons, buoys, and public piers," so far as the same provides for defraying the necessary expense of supporting light-houses, beacons, buoys, and public piers, and the stakeage of channels on the sea-coast; and also so much of the act, entitled "An act to provide for mitigating or remitting the penalties and forfeitures accruing under the revenue laws in certain cases, and to make further provision for the payment of pensions to invalids," as relates to the mitigating or remitting the penalties and forfeitures accruing under the revenue laws in certain cases, be, and the same hereby are continued in force until the end of the next session of Congress, and no longer.

Approved, March 2, 1795.

An Act relative to cessions of jurisdiction in places where light-houses, beacons, buoys, and public piers have been or may hereafter be erected and fixed.

Be it enacted, &c. That where cessions have been, or hereafter may be made, by any State of the jurisdiction of places where light-houses, beacons, buoys, or public piers, have been erected and fixed, or may, by law, be provided to be erected or fixed, with reservation, that process, civil and criminal, issuing under the authority of such State, may be executed and served therein, such cessations shall be deemed sufficient, under the laws of the United States providing for the supporting or erecting of light-houses, beacons, buoys, and public piers.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That where any State hath made or shall make a cession of jurisdiction, for the purposes aforesaid, without reservation, all process, civil and criminal, issuing under the authority of such State or the United States, may be served and executed within the places, the jurisdiction of which has been so ceded, in the same manner as if no such cession had been made.

Approved, March 2, 1795.

An Act relative to the passing of coasting vessels between Long Island and Rhode Island.

Be it enacted, &c., That coasting vessels going from Long Island, in the State of New York, to the State of Rhode Island, or from the State of Rhode Island to the said Long Island, shall have the same privileges as are allowed to vessels under the like circumstances going from a district in one State to a district in the same or an adjoining State.

Approved, March 2, 1795.

An Act to alter and amend an act, entitled "An act laying certain duties upon snuff and refined sugar."

Be it enacted, &c., That the duty of eight cents per pound on snuff, laid by the act of last session, entitled "An act laying certain duties upon snuff and refined sugar," shall cease on the last day of March, in the present year, and shall not thenceforth be collected; but, in lieu thereof, there shall be levied and collected upon all mills, employed in the manufacture of snuff within the United States, the following yearly rates and duties, to wit: For and upon each and every mortar, contained in any mill worked by water, and for every pair of millstones, employed in the manufacture of snuff, five hundred and sixty dollars; upon every pestle in any mill, other than mills worked by hand, one hundred and forty dollars; upon every pestle, in any mill worked by hand, one hundred and twelve dollars; and upon every mill in which snuff is manufactured, by stampers and grinders, two thousand two hundred and forty dollars per annum.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the duties aforesaid shall be levied, collected, and accounted for, by the same officers as are provided by the act, entitled, "An act repealing, after the last day of June next, the duties heretofore laid upon distilled spirits, imported from abroad, and laying others in their stead, and also upon spirits distilled within the United States, and for appropriating the same," subject to the superintendence and control of the Department of the Treasury, according to the respective authorities and duties of the officers thereof.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That every person, who shall be a manufacturer of snuff, on the first day of April, in the present year, shall, within thirty days thereafter, and in each succeeding year, at least thirty days before the first day of April, make a true and exact entry or entries, in writing, at the office of inspection, which shall be nearest to the house or building, where he shall carry on the business or trade of manufacturing snuff, therein specifying, truly and particularly, every house or building in which the said manufacture shall be carried on, with the number of mortars in every mill by him owned, occupied, or used, and worked by water, and every pair of millstones, used or employed in the manufacture of snuff, and every pestle, in every mill, as aforesaid, distinctly specifying such pestles as are worked by other means than by hand, and, also, every pestle worked by hand, as also every mill in which snuff is manufactured by stampers and grinders: And every person, who shall commence the business or trade of manufacturing snuff, after the said first day of April, shall, at least thirty days before commencing such manufacture, make like entry or entries yearly, in manner as is before directed, and in failure thereof, every such manufacturer shall forfeit and lose every mill, in respect to which such entry shall not be made, with the utensils thereto belonging, and shall also forfeit and pay the sum of five hundred dollars, to be recovered with costs of suit.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That every person, who shall be, on the first day of April, in the present year, or at any time thereafter, a manufacturer of snuff, within the United States, and who shall have made the entry or entries hereinbefore directed, shall be entitled on application therefor, in writing, by himself, or his agent, or attorney, to the officer of inspection with whom entry shall have been made, to receive a license for each and every mill by him owned, occupied, or used, in carrying on the said manufacture of snuff, for the term of one year, which license shall be granted without fee or charge, upon the condition of giving a bond or bonds, with one or more sufficient sureties, for the amount of the duty or duties, for one year, which, according to this act, ought to be paid for and upon the mill, in respect to which the said license is requested, with condition to pay the same in three equal parts: one-third part at the expiration of nine months, another third part at the expiration of twelve months, and the remaining third part at the expiration of fifteen months, from the date of such license: Provided, That in lieu of the said bond or bonds, it shall be at the option of the manufacturer to pay the said amount of the said duty immediately, with a deduction or abatement of six per cent.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That the licenses, herein directed to be granted, shall be prepared by the supervisors of the revenue, respectively, pursuant to such forms as shall be prescribed by the Treasury Department; and, when issued, such licenses shall, in respect to all persons who shall be manufacturers of snuff, on the first day of April, in the present year, bear date on the said day; and in respect to all persons who shall thereafter commence the said manufacture, such license shall bear date on the first day of the quarter of the year in which the said licenses shall be issued, and the said quarters of the year shall be deemed and are hereby declared to commence on the first days of January, April, July, and October, in each year.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That every manufacturer of snuff, to whom a license shall have been granted, so long as he, or she, shall intend to carry on the business of manufacturing snuff, shall yearly, and every year within the thirty days immediately preceding the expiration of each license, apply for a new license for the next succeeding year, in manner heretofore directed, and, in like manner, shall pay or secure the payment of the duties for such year.

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That if, after the first day of April next, any person shall carry on the business of manufacturing snuff, without a license for that purpose, according to this act, or shall carry on the same at or with any mill, other than that mentioned in such license, such manufacturer, so offending, shall forfeit and pay, upon every conviction of such offence, treble the yearly amount of the duty hereby charged upon the mill or mills, wherein or whereby the said business shall be so carried on. And all duties and penalties imposed by this act, shall attach to, and remain as a lien upon, each and every mill, in respect to which such duty or penalty shall have accrued, until the same be fully satisfied and paid.

Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That upon all snuff, which, after the last day of March, in the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-five, shall be manufactured in the United States, and shall be exported therefrom, under the limitations and provisions hereinafter prescribed, the exporter or exporters thereof shall be entitled to a drawback of six cents per pound: Provided, That the person, shall amount to three hundred pounds.

Sec. 9. And be it further enacted, That in order to entitle the exporter or exporters of any snuff, to a drawback thereon, every such person shall, previous to the removal thereof from the mill or warehouse, where the same may be, make out, in writing, an exact entry, in which shall be specified the outward packages, in which the same is intended to be exported, the name of the manufacturer, and the marks and numbers of each, the quantity of snuff in each package, and the number of bottles, canisters, bladders, or other packages, containing the same, the name of the vessel and commander, in which such snuff is intended to be exported; and shall make oath or affirmation to be the truth of such entry, that the snuff therein specified was manufactured in the United States, after the last day of March, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-five, and the name or names of the person by whom, and the mill where, it was manufactured, and that the same is truly and bona fide intended to be exported out of the United States, and that no part thereof is intended to be relanded therein. And upon such entry being so made and certified, it shall be the duty of the collector to whom such entry is tendered to cause the said packages to be examined, and to permit the same to be exported, under the inspection of an officer of the customs, in like manner as is provided for the exportation of other goods, wares, and merchandise entitled to drawback: Provided, That no drawback shall be allowed on any snuff, except the same shall be exported from any of the ports, at which ships or vessels from the Cape of Good Hope, or from any place beyond the same, are admitted to make entry.

Sec. 10. And be it further enacted, That every exporter of snuff entitled to drawback, shall enter into bonds, with one or more sureties, in an amount equal to double the amount of the drawback, conditioned that the same shall not be re-landed within the United States; and the master or commander of the ship or vessel, in which such snuff is reported to be shipped, shall make oath or affirmation, that the packages specified in the outward entry, are actually laden on board his ship or vessel, and that the same, or any part thereof, shall not be relanded in the United States; and upon such oath or affirmation being made, and the other provisions of the act being complied with, the collector, with whom such entry is made, shall grant a debenture or debentures, for the amount of the drawback to which such snuff is entitled, payable in twelve months from the time of granting the same; and such debenture or debentures shall be discharged by the collector granting the same, at the expiration of the term, out of any public money in his hands.

Sec. 11. Provided always, and be it further enacted, That before the payment of any debenture, the person demanding such payment shall produce to the collector the oath or affirmation of the master and mate of the vessel, (in which the snuff, for which such debenture was granted, is declared that the same was actually landed in some foreign port or place, and was not, or any part thereof, to the best of their knowledge and belief, relanded or brought back to the United States; and the person demanding such payment shall likewise make oath or affirmation, in like manner, that the snuff for which such debenture was granted, was not, according to his best knowledge and belief, relanded in, or brought back to, the United States: Provided, also, That in cases of loss at sea, or other unavoidable accident, where by the oath or affirmation of the captain or mate of the ship or vessel cannot be obtained, it shall be lawful for the Comptroller of the Treasury, to admit such other proof as to him shall appear satisfactory, under the special circumstances of the case.

Sec. 12. And be it further enacted, That if any snuff entered for exportation, with intention to obtain a drawback thereon, shall be relanded or attempted to be relanded within the United States, it shall be subject to seizure and forfeiture, together with the ship or vessel from which it shall be unladen, and the vessel or boat in which it shall be put; and the master or commander of the ship or vessel from which the same is unladen, shall, moreover, forfeit and pay five hundred dollars: Provided, That every prosecution for any such offence shall be commenced within twelve months from the time when the same was committed, and that the ship, vessel, or boat, from which any such snuff shall be unladen or landed, shall continue subject to such seizure and forfeiture for twelve months from the time the offence was committed, and no longer.

Sec. 13. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the collectors granting debentures for snuff exported, to keep a separate account thereof, and to specify the mill or mills in which each parcel exported, was manufactured. And the Secretary of the Treasury shall cause an account to be laid before the Legislature, annually, of the produce of the revenue, arising from snuff, and of the amount of the drawbacks for which debentures have been granted in each year.

Sec. 14. And be it further enacted, That all penalties and forfeitures which shall be incurred pursuant to this act, shall be divided and distributed, one half thereof to the use of the United States, and the other half thereof to the use of the person, who, if an officer of inspection, shall first discover, or if not an officer of inspection, shall first give information of the cause, matter, or thing, whereby any of the said penalties and forfeitures shall have been incurred.

Sec. 15. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for the President of the United States, who is hereby empowered to make such compensation to the officers of inspection, employed in the collection of the duties aforesaid, and on refined sugar, and on the duties upon bariages for the conveyance of persons, and for incidental expenses, as he shall judge reasonable, not exceeding in the whole five per centum of the total amount of the said duties collected.

Sec. 16. And be it further enacted, That, from and after the last day of March, in the present year, the several clauses and provisions of the act, entitled "An act, laying certain duties upon snuff and refined sugar," so far as the same shall relate to the laying and collecting of duties on snuff manufactured in the United States, shall be, and the same are hereby, repealed: except as to the recovery and receipt of such duties on snuff as shall then have accrued, and the payment of drawbacks on snuff exported, and as to the recovery of any penalties and forfeitures, which shall have been incurred before and on the said day, but the revenue to arise from the duty on snuff manufactured within the United States shall remain charged with the same appropriations as if this act had not passed; and that this act shall continue in force until the first day of March, one thousand eight hundred and one.

Approved, March 3, 1795.

An Act for continuing and regulating the Military Establishment of the United States, and for repealing sundry acts heretofore passed on that subject.

Be it enacted, &c., That the present Military Establishment of the United States, composed of a corps of artilleryists and engineers, to consist of nine hundred and ninety-two non-commissioned officers, privates, and musicians; and of a legion, to consist of four thousand eight hundred non-commissioned officers, privates, and musicians, be, and the same is hereby continued.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the said corps of artilleryists and engineers be completed, conformably to the act of the eighth of May last, establishing the same, and prescribing the number and term of enlistments, and the method of organization.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the legion of the United States be also completed, to the number of four thousand eight hundred non-commissioned officers, privates, and musicians, by voluntary enlistments for the term of three years; and that the sub-legions composing the same, be organized in such manner as the President of the United States shall direct: Provided, nevertheless, That no such enlistment shall be made after three years from the passing of this act.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That it shall be stipulated as a condition in the enlistments for cavalry, that they shall serve as dismounted dragoons, when ordered so to do; and that, in all cases of enlistments of the troops of every description, there be expressly reserved to the Government a right to discharge the whole or any part thereof, at such times, and in such proportions, as may be deemed expedient.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That the commissioned officers who shall be employed in the recruiting service, shall be entitled to receive, for every able bodied recruit duly enlisted and mustered, of at least five feet six inches in height, and not under the age of eighteen, nor above the age of forty-six years, the sum of two dollars.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That there shall be allowed and paid to each soldier now in the service of the United States, or discharged therefrom subsequent to the third day of March last, who shall re-enlist, a bounty of sixteen dollars; and to each person not now in the Army of the United States, or discharged as above, who shall hereafter enlist, a bounty of fourteen dollars; but the payment of four dollars of the bounty of each and every man so enlisting, shall be deferred until he shall have joined the corps in which he is to serve.

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That every non-commissioned officer, private, and musician, of the artillery and infantry, shall receive, annually, the following articles of uniform clothing, to wit: one hat, or helmet, one coat, one vest, two pair of woollen and two pair of linen overalls, four pair of shoes, four shirts, two pair of socks, one blanket, one stock and clasp, and one pair of buckles; and that there be furnished to the cavalry and riflemen, such clothing as shall be the most suitable and best adapted to the nature of the service, having regard therein, as nearly as may be to the value of the clothing allowed as above, to the infantry and artillery.

Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That every non-commissioned officer, private, and musician, shall receive, daily, the following rations of provision, to wit: one pound of beef, or three-quarters of a pound of pork, one pound of bread or flour, half a gill of rum, brandy, or whiskey, and at the rate of one quart of salt, two quarts of vinegar, two pounds of soap, and one pound of candles, to every hundred rations, or the value thereof, at the contract price, where the same shall become due: and if, at such post, supplies are not furnished by contract, then such allowance as shall be deemed equitable, having reference to former contracts, and the position of the place in question.

Sec. 9. Provided always, and be it further enacted, That to those in the military service of the United States who are, or shall be employed on the Western Frontiers, there shall be allowed, during the time of their being so employed, two ounces of flour or bread, and two ounces of beef or pork, in addition to each of their rations, and half a pint of salt, in addition to every hundred of their rations.

Sec. 10. And be it further enacted, That the monthly pay of the officers, non-commissioned officers, musicians, and privates on the Military Establishment of the United States, be as follows, to wit:—General Staff—A Major General, one hundred and sixty-six dollars; a Brigadier General, one hundred and four dollars; a Quartermaster General, one hundred dollars; Adjutant General, to do also the duty of Inspector, seventy-five dollars; Chaplain, fifty dollars; Surgeon, twenty dollars; Deputy Quartermaster, fifty dollars; Aid-de-Camp, in addition to his pay in the line, twenty-four dollars; Brigade Major, to act also as Deputy Inspector, in addition to his pay in the line, twenty-four dollars; Principal Artificer, forty dollars; Second Artificer, twenty-six dollars. — Regimental. — Lieutenant Colonel commandant, seventy-five dollars; Major of artillery and Major of dragoons, fifty-five dollars; Major of infantry, fifty dollars; Paymaster Adjutant, and Quartermaster, in addition to their pay in the line, ten dollars; Captains, forty dollars; Lieutenants, twenty-six dollars; Ensigns and Cornets, twenty dollars; Surgeons, forty-five dollars; Surgeon's mates, thirty dollars; Sergeant-majors and Quartermaster-sergeants, eight dollars; senior musicians, seven dollars; sergeants, seven dollars; corporals, six dollars; musicians, five dollars; privates, four dollars; artificers allowed to the infantry, light dragoons, and artillery, nine dollars; matrons and nurses in the hospital, eight dollars.

Sec. 11. And be it further enacted, That the commissioned officers aforesaid shall be entitled to receive for their daily subsistence, the following number of rations of provisions, to wit: a Major General fifteen rations; a Brigadier General, twelve rations; a Lieutenant Colonel commandant, and Quartermaster-General, each six rations; a Major of artillery and Aid-de-Camp, four rations; a Captain three rations; a Lieutenant, or cornet, two rations; a Surgeon, as well as hospital as regimental, three rations; a Surgeon's Mate, two rations; a Deputy Quartermaster, two rations; a principal and second artificer, each, two rations; a Chaplain, two rations, or money in lieu thereof, at the option of the said officers, at the contract price, at the posts, respectively, where the rations shall become due.

Sec. 12. And be it further enacted, That the officers hereinafter described shall, whenever forage shall not be furnished by the public, receive at the rate of the following enumerated sums, per month, instead thereof, to wit: the Major General, twenty dollars; the Brigadier General, sixteen dollars; Lieutenant Colonel, twelve dollars; Quartermaster General, Adjutant General, and Surgeon General, each, twelve dollars; Major, ten dollars; Aid-de-Camp, Brigade Major, and Surgeon, each, ten dollars; Captain of cavalry, eight dollars; Chaplain and Surgeon's Mate, each, six dollars; Deputy Quartermaster and subalterns of cavalry, each, six dollars; Principal Artificer, Paymaster, Adjutant, and regimental Quartermaster, each, six dollars.

Sec. 13. And be it further enacted, That, if any officer, non-commissioned officer, private or musician aforesaid, shall be wounded or disabled, while in the line of his duty, in public service, he shall be placed on the list of the invalids of the United States, at such rate of pay, and under such regulations, as shall be directed by the President of the United States for the time being: Provided, always, That the rate of compensation to be allowed for such wounds or disabilities to a commissioned officer shall never exceed, for the highest disability, half the monthly pay of such officer, at the time of his being so disabled or wounded; and that the rate of compensation to non-commissioned officers, privates, and musicians, shall never exceed five dollars per month: And provided, also, That all inferior disabilities shall entitle the person so disabled to receive an allowance proportionate to the highest disability.

Sec. 14. And be it further enacted, That the officers, non-commissioned officers, privates, and musicians, aforesaid, shall be governed by the rules and articles of war which have been established by the United States in Congress assembled, as far as the same may be applicable to the Constitution of the United States, or by such rules and articles as may hereafter by law be established.

Sec. 15. And be it further enacted, That every officer, non-commissioned officer, private, and musician aforesaid, shall take and subscribe the following oath or affirmation, to wit: "I, A. B., do solemnly swear (or affirm, as the case may be,) to bear true allegiance to the United States of America, and to serve them honestly and faithfully, against all their enemies or opposers, whomsoever, and to obey the orders of the President of the United States, and the orders of the officers appointed over me, according to the rules and articles of war."

Sec. 16. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for the President of the United States to arm the troops aforesaid, whether riflemen, artilleryists, dragoons, or infantry, as he shall think proper; and that it be also lawful for him to forbid to raise, or to discharge, after they shall be raised, any part thereof, in case events shall, in his judgment, tender his so doing consistent with public safety, and general convenience and economy.

Sec. 17. And be it further enacted, That every person who shall procure or entice a soldier in the service of the United States, to desert, or who shall conceal such soldier, knowing him to have deserted, or who shall purchase from such soldier his arms, or his uniform clothing, or any part thereof; and every Captain or commanding officer of any ship or vessel, who shall enter on board such ship or vessel, as one of his crew, knowing him to have deserted, or otherwise carry away such soldier, or shall refuse to deliver him up to the orders of his commanding officer, shall, upon legal conviction, be fined, at the discretion of the Court, in any sum not exceeding three hundred dollars, or be imprisoned for any term not exceeding one year.

Sec. 18. And be it further enacted, That the several acts, entitled "An act for regulating the Military Establishment of the United States;" "An act for raising and adding another regiment to the Military Establishment of the United States, and for making further provision for the protection of the frontiers;" "An act for making further and more effectual provision for the protection of the frontiers of the United States," be, and the same are hereby repealed; and, also, so much of any act or acts of the present session, as comes within the purview of this act: Provided, always, That nothing in this section contained shall be so construed, as to vacate the commissions which have been issued, or any appointments or enlistments which have been made in pursuance of the acts herein repealed.

Approved, March 3, 1795.

An Act making further provision for the support of Public Credit, and for the redemption of the Public Debt.

Be it enacted, &c., That it shall be lawful for the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund, and they are hereby empowered, with the approbation of the President of the United States, to borrow, or cause to be borrowed from time to time, such sums, in anticipation of the revenue appropriated, not exceeding, in one year, one million of dollars, to be reimbursed within a year from the time of each loan, as may be necessary for the payment of the interest which shall annually accrue on the public debt; and for the payment of the interest on any such temporary loan, which shall not exceed six per centum per annum, so much of the proceeds of the duties on goods, wares and merchandise imported, on the tonnage of ships or vessels, and upon spirits distilled within the United States, and stills, as may be necessary, shall be, and are hereby, appropriated.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That a loan be opened at the Treasury, to the full amount of the present foreign debt, to continue open until the last day of December, in the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-six, and that the sums which may be subscribed to the said loan shall be payable and receivable, by way of exchange, in equal sums of the principal of the said foreign debt; and that any sum so subscribed and paid shall bear an interest equal to the rate of interest which is now payable on the principal of such part of the foreign debt as shall be paid or exchanged therefor, together with an addition of one-half per centum per annum; the said interest to commence on the first day of January next succeeding the time of each subscription, and to be paid quarterly, at the same periods at which interest is now payable and paid upon the domestic funded debt: Provided, That the principal of the said loan may be reimbursed at any time, at the pleasure of the United States.

Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That credits to the respective subscribers for the sums by them respectively subscribed to the said loan, shall be entered and given on the books of the Treasury in like manner as for the present domestic funded debt; and that certificates thereof, of a tenor conformable with the provisions of this act, signed by the Register of the Treasury, shall issue to the several subscribers, and that the said credits, or stock standing in the names of the said subscribers, respectively, shall be transferable, in like manner, and by the like ways and means, as are provided by the seventh section of the act aforesaid, entitled "An act making provision for the debt of the United States," touching the credits or stock therein mentioned; and that the interest to be paid upon the stock loan shall be paid at the offices or places where the credits for the same shall from time to time stand or be, subject to the like conditions and restrictions as are prescribed in and by the eighth section of the act last aforesaid.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That the interest and principal of all loans authorized by this act shall be made payable at the Treasury of the United States only, so far as relates to the payment of the principal and interest of the domestic debt.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That so much of the duties on goods, wares, and merchandise imported, on the tonnage of ships or vessels, and upon spirits distilled within the United States, and stills, heretofore appropriated for the interest of the foreign debt, as may be liberated or set free, by subscriptions to the said loan, together with such further sums of the proceeds of the said duties as may be necessary, shall be, and they are hereby, pledged and appropriated, for the payment of the interest which shall be payable upon the sums subscribed to the said loan, and shall continue so pledged and appropriated until the principal of the said loan shall be fully reimbursed and redeemed: Provided, always, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to alter, change, or in any manner affect the provisions heretofore made concerning the said foreign debt, according to contract, either during the pendency of the said loan or after the closing thereof; but every thing shall proceed, touching the said debt, and every part thereof, in the same manner as if this act had never been passed, except as to such holders thereof as may subscribe to the said loan, and from the time of the commencement thereof in each case, that is, when interest on any sum subscribed shall begin to accrue.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That the several and respective duties laid and contained in and by the act, entitled "An act laying additional duties on goods, wares, and merchandise imported into the United States," passed the seventh day of June, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-four, shall, together with the other duties heretofore charged with the payment of interest on the public debt, continue to be levied, collected, and paid, until the whole of the capital or principal of the present debt of the United States, and future loans which may be made pursuant to law, for the exchange, reimbursement, or redemption thereof, or of any part thereof, shall be reimbursed or deemed, and shall be, and hereby are, pledged and appropriated for the payment of interest upon the said debt and loans, until the same shall be so reimbursed or redeemed.

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That the reservation made by the fourth section of the aforesaid act, entitled "An act making provision for the reduction of the public debt," be annulled, and, in lieu thereof, that so much of the duties on goods, wares, and merchandise imported, on the tonnage of ships or vessels, and upon spirits distilled within the United States, and stills, as may be necessary, be, and the same hereby are, substituted, pledged, and appropriated for satisfying the purpose of the said reservation.

Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That the following appropriations, in addition to those heretofore made be made, to the fund constituted by the seventh section of the act, entitled "An act supplementary to the act making provision for the debt of the United States," passed the eighth day of May, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-two, to be hereafter denominated "The Sinking Fund," to wit: First, So much of the proceeds of the duties on goods, wares, and merchandise imported, on the tonnage of ships or vessels, and on spirits distilled within the United States, and stills, as, together with the moneys which now constitute the said fund, and shall accrue to it, by virtue of the provisions hereinbefore made, and by the interest upon each instalment, or part of principal which shall be reimbursed, will be sufficient, yearly and every year, commencing the first day of January next to reimburse and pay so much as may rightfully be reimbursed and paid, of the principal of that part of the debt or stock which, on the said first day of January next, shall bear an interest of six per centum per annum, redeemable by payments on account both of principal and interest, not exceeding, in one year, eight per centum, excluding that which shall stand to the credit of the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund, and that which shall stand to the credit of certain States, in consequence of the balances reported in their favor by the Commissioners for settling accounts between the United States and individual States: Secondly, The dividends which shall be from time to time declared on so much of the stock of the Bank of the United States as belongs to the United States, (deducting thereout such sums as will be requisite to pay interest on any part remaining unpaid of the loan of two million of dollars had of the Bank of the United States, pursuant to the eleventh section of the act by which the said Bank is incorporated.) Thirdly, So much of the duties on goods, wares, and merchandise imported, on the tonnage of ships or vessels, and on spirits distilled within the United States, and stills, as, with the said dividends, after such deduction, will be sufficient, yearly and every year, to pay the remaining instalments of the principal of the said loan as they shall become due, and as, together with any moneys which, by virtue of provisions in former acts, and hereinbefore made, shall, on the first day of January, in the year one thousand eight hundred and two, belong to the said Sinking Fund, not otherwise specially appropriated; and with the interest on each instalment, or part of principal, which shall from time to time be reimbursed or paid of that part of the debt or stock, which, on the first day of January, in the year one thousand eight hundred and one, shall begin to bear an interest of six per centum per annum, will be sufficient, yearly and every year, commencing on the first day of January, in the year one thousand eight hundred and two, to reimburse and pay so much as may rightfully be reimbursed and paid of the said principal of the said debt or stock which shall so begin to bear an interest of six per centum per annum, on the said first day of January, in the year one thousand eight hundred and one, to the credit of the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund and that which shall stand to the credit of certain States, as aforesaid: Fourthly, The net proceeds of the sales of lands belonging, or which shall hereafter belong to the United States, in the Western Territory thereof: Fifthly, All moneys which shall be received into the Treasury by reason of count of debts due to the United States by reason of any matter prior to their present Constitution: And, lastly, All surpluses of the revenues of the United States which shall remain, at the end of any calendar year, beyond the amount of the appropriations charged upon the said revenues, and which, during the session of Congress next thereafter, shall not be otherwise specially appropriated or reserved by law.

Sec. 9. And be it further enacted, That as well the moneys which shall accrue to the said Sinking Fund, by virtue of the provisions of this act, as those which shall have accrued to the same by virtue of the provisions of any former act or acts, shall be under the direction and management of the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund, or the officers designated in and by the second section of the act, entitled "An act making provision for the reduction of the Public Debt," passed the twelfth day of August, one thousand seven hundred and ninety, and their successors in office; and shall be and continue appropriated to the said fund until the whole of the present debt of the United States, foreign and domestic, funded and unfunded, including future loans, which may be made for reimbursing or redeeming any instalments or parts of principal of the said debt, shall be reimbursed and redeemed; and shall be, and are hereby declared to be, vested in the said Commissioners, in trust, to be applied according to the provisions of the aforesaid act of the eighth day of May, in the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-two, and of this act, to the reimbursement and redemption of the said debt, including the loans aforesaid, until the same shall be fully reimbursed and redeemed. And the faith of the United States is hereby pledged that the moneys or funds aforesaid shall inviolably remain and be appropriated and vested, as aforesaid, to be applied to the said reimbursement and redemption, in manner aforesaid, until the same shall be fully and completely effected.

Sec. 10. And be it further enacted, That all reimbursements of the capital or principal of the Public Debt, foreign and domestic, shall be made under the superintendence of the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund, who are hereby empowered and required, if necessary, with the approbation of the President of the United States, as any instalments or parts of the said capital or principal become due, to borrow, on the credit of the United States, the sums requisite for the payment of the said instalments or parts of principal: Provided, That any loan which may be made to the said Commissioners shall be liable to reimbursement at the pleasure of the United States; and that the rate of interest thereupon shall not exceed six per centum per annum; and, for greater caution, it is hereby declared that it shall be deemed a good execution of the said power to borrow, for the said Commissioners, with the approbation of the President, to cause to be constituted certificates of stock, signed by the Register of the Treasury, for the sums to be respectively borrowed, bearing an interest of six per centum per annum, and redeemable at the pleasure of the United States; and to cause the said certificates of stock to be sold in the market of the United States, or elsewhere: Provided, That no such stock be sold under par. And for the payment of interest on any sum or sums which may be so borrowed, either by direct loans or by the sale of certificates of stock, the interest on the sum or sums which shall be reimbursed by the proceeds thereof, (except that upon the funded stock, bearing and to bear an interest of six per centum, redeemable by payments, not exceeding in one year eight per centum on account both of principal and interest,) and so much of the duties on goods, wares, and merchandise imported, on the tonnage of ships or vessels, and upon spirits distilled within the United States, and upon stills, as may be necessary, shall be, and hereby are, pledged and appropriated.

Sec. 11. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund to cause to be applied and paid, out of the said fund, yearly and every year, at the Treasury of the United States, the several and respective sums following, to wit: First—Such sum and sums as, according to the right for that purpose reserved, may rightfully be paid for, and towards the reimbursement or redemption of such Debt or stock of the United States, as, on the first day of January next, shall bear an interest of six per centum per annum, redeemable by payments, not exceeding in one year eight per centum, on account both of principal and interest, excluding that standing to the credit of the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund, and that standing to the credit of certain States, as aforesaid, commencing the said reimbursement or redemption on the said first day of January next. Secondly—Such sum and sums as, according to the conditions of the aforesaid Loan, had of the Bank of the United States, shall be henceforth payable towards the reimbursement thereof, as the same shall respectively accrue. Thirdly—Such sum and sums, as according to the right for that purpose reserved, may rightfully be paid for and towards the reimbursement or redemption of such Debt or stock of the United States as, on the first day of January, in the year one thousand eight hundred and one, shall begin to bear an interest of six per centum per annum, redeemable by payments, not exceeding in one year eight per centum, on account both of principal and interest, excluding that standing to the credit of the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund, and that standing to the credit of certain States, as aforesaid, commencing the said reimbursement or redemption, on the first day of January, in the year one thousand eight hundred and two; and also to cause to be applied all such surplus of the said fund as may at any time exist, after satisfying the purposes aforesaid, towards the further and final redemption of the present Debt of the United States, foreign and domestic, funded and unfunded, including loans for the reimbursement thereof, by payment or purchase, until the said Debt shall be completely reimbursed or redeemed.

Sec. 12. Provided always, and be it further enacted, That nothing in this act shall be construed to vest in the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund a right to pay, in the purchase or discharge of the unfunded Domestic Debt of the United States, a higher rate than the market price or value of the Funded Debt of the United States: And, provided also, That if, after all the debts and loans aforesaid, now due, and that shall arise under this act, excepting the said Debt or stock bearing an interest of three per cent., shall be fully paid and discharged, any part of the principal of the said Debt or stock bearing an interest of three per cent., as aforesaid, shall be unredeemed, the Government shall have liberty, if they think proper, to make other and different appropriations of the said funds.

Sec. 13. And be it further enacted, That all priorities heretofore established in the appropriations by law, for the interest on the Debt of the United States, as between the different parts of the said Debt, shall, after the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-six, cease, with regard to all creditors of the United States who do not, before the expiration of the said period, signify, in writing, to the Comptroller of the Treasury, their dissent therefrom; and that thenceforth, with the exception only of the debts of such creditors who shall so signify their dissent, the funds or revenues charged with the said appropriations shall, together, constitute a common or consolidated fund, chargeable indiscriminately, and without priority, with the payment of the said interest.

Sec. 14. And be it further enacted, That all certificates, commonly called Loan Office certificates, final settlements, and indents of interest, which, at the time of passing this act, shall be outstanding, shall, on or before the first day of January, in the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-seven, be presented at the office of the Auditor of the Treasury of the United States, for the purpose of being exchanged for other certificates of equivalent value and tenor, or, at the option of the holders thereof, respectively, to be registered at the said office, and returned; in which case it shall be the duty of the said Auditor to cause some durable mark or marks to be set on each certificate, which shall ascertain and fix its identity, and whether genuine, or counterfeit, or forged; and every of the said certificates which shall not be presented at the said office within the said time, shall be forever after barred or precluded from settlement of allowance.

Sec. 15. And be it further enacted, That if any transfer of stock standing to the credit of a State shall be made pursuant to the act, entitled "An act authorizing the transfer of the stock standing to the credit of certain States," passed the second day of January, in this present year, after the last day of December next, the same shall be upon condition, that it shall be lawful to reimburse, at a subsequent period of reimbursement, so much of the principal of the stock so transferred as will make the reimbursement thereof equal in proportion and degree to that of the same stock transferred previous to the said day.

Sec. 16. And be it further enacted, That, in regard to any sum which shall have remained unexpended upon any appropriation other than for the payment of interest on the Funded Debt; for the payment of interest upon, and reimbursement, according to contract, of any loan or loans made on account of the United States, for the purposes of the Sinking Fund, or for a purpose in respect to which a longer duration is specially assigned by law, for more than two years after the expiration of the calendar year in which the act of appropriation shall have been passed, such appropriation shall be deemed to have ceased and been determined; and the sum so unexpended shall be carried to an account on the books of the Treasury, to be denominated "The Surplus Fund." But no appropriation shall be deemed to have so ceased and been determined until after the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-five, unless it shall appear to the Secretary of the Treasury, that the object thereof hath been fully satisfied; in which case it shall be lawful for him to cause to be carried the unexpended residue thereof to the said account of "the Surplus Fund."

Sec. 17. And be it further enacted, That the Department of the Treasury, according to the respective duties of the several officers thereof, shall establish such forms and rules of proceeding for and touching the execution of this act as shall be conformable with the provisions thereof.

Sec. 18. And be it further enacted, That all the restrictions and regulations heretofore established by law for regulating the execution of the duties enjoined upon the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund shall apply to and be in as full force for the execution of the analogous duties enjoined by this act as if they were herein particularly repeated and re-enacted; and a particular account of all sales of stock, or of loans by them made, shall be laid before Congress within fourteen days after their meeting next after the making of any such loan or sale of stock.

Sec. 19. And be it further enacted, That in every case in which power is given by this act to make a loan, it shall be lawful for such loan to be made of the Bank of the United States, although the same may exceed the sum of fifty thousand dollars.

Sec. 20. And be it further enacted, That so much of the act laying duties upon carriages for the conveyance of persons, and of the act laying duties on licenses for selling wines and foreign distilled spirituous liquors by retail, and of the act laying certain duties upon snuff and refined sugar, and of the act laying duties on property sold at auction, as limits the duration of the said several acts, be, and the same is hereby repealed; and that all the said several acts be, and the same are hereby, continued in force until the first day of March, one thousand eight hundred and one.

Approved, March 3, 1795.

An Act making further appropriations for the Military and Naval Establishments, and for the support of Government.

Be it enacted, &c., That, including the appropriation of five hundred thousand dollars, made for the Military Establishment for the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-five, by an act of the present session, there be appropriated for the said Military Establishment a sum not exceeding one million four hundred and sixty-nine thousand four hundred and thirty-nine dollars and twenty-nine cents—that is to say: For the pay of the legion of the United States, three hundred and four thousand five hundred and forty-eight dollars. For the pay of the corps of artillery, fifty-six thousand eight hundred and sixty-eight dollars. For subsistence of the legion and artillery, three hundred and sixty-one thousand seven hundred and nineteen dollars and thirty cents. For forage and cavalry, thirty-three thousand seven hundred and twenty dollars. For clothing, one hundred and twenty thousand four hundred and forty dollars. For equipments for the cavalry, seven thousand three hundred and fourteen dollars. For horses for the cavalry, twenty-four thousand dollars. For bounty, five thousand dollars. For the hospital department, twenty thousand dollars. For the ordnance department, eleven thousand three hundred and sixty-five dollars and ninety-nine cents. For the Indian department, eighty thousand dollars. For the quartermaster's department, one hundred and fifty thousand dollars. For contingencies of the War Department, thirty thousand dollars. For the defensive protection of the frontiers, one hundred and thirty thousand dollars. For the completion of the fortifications, fifty thousand dollars. For additional pay and bounty to the legion and artillery, pursuant to an act of the present session, seventy-seven thousand four hundred and sixty-four dollars.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That, for defraying the expense of six months' pay and subsistence of a detachment of militia under the command of Major General Morgan, pursuant to an act of the present session, there be appropriated the sum of one hundred thousand six hundred and eighty-two dollars—that is to say: For the general staff, four thousand one hundred and thirty-four dollars. For Major Brooke's battalion, nineteen thousand eight hundred and forty-eight dollars. For Major Linn's battalion, twenty-one thousand three hundred dollars. For cavalry, twenty-three thousand four hundred dollars. For subsistence, twenty-four thousand dollars. For forage for officers and cavalry, eight thousand dollars.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the surplus which may remain unexpended of the sum of six hundred and eighty-eight thousand eight hundred and eighty-eight dollars and eighty-two cents, which was appropriated for the use of the Naval Department, in the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-four, by an act passed the ninth day of June last, shall be, and the same is hereby, appropriated to the use of the said Naval Department, for the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-five.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That there be appropriated the several sums following, to wit: For the payment of military pensions, for the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-five, eighty-five thousand three hundred and fifty-seven dollars and four cents; and a sum not exceeding ten thousand dollars for the contingent purposes of Government, subject to the disposition of the President of the United States.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That the several appropriations hereinbefore made, shall be paid and discharged out of the funds following, to wit: First—The surplus of the sum of six hundred thousand dollars, reserved by the "Act making provision for the Debt of the United States," and which will accrue during the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-five. Secondly—The surplus of revenue and income beyond the appropriations heretofore charged thereupon, to the end of the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-five; and, Thirdly—The surplus which shall remain unexpended of the moneys appropriated to the use of the War Department for the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-four.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That the President of the United States be empowered to borrow, on behalf of the United States, of the Bank of the United States, which is hereby authorized to lend the same, or of any other body or bodies politic, person or persons, any sum or sums not exceeding in the whole the sums herein appropriated, and to be applied to the purposes aforesaid, and to be reimbursed, as well interest as principal, out of the funds aforesaid.

Approved, March 3, 1795.

An Act supplementary to the act entitled "An act establishing a Mint, and regulating the coins of the United States."

BE IT ENACTED, &c., That, for the better conducting of the business of the Mint of the United States, there shall be an additional officer appointed therein, by the name of the Melter and Refiner, whose duty shall be to take charge of all copper, and silver or gold bullion, delivered out by the Treasurer of the Mint, after it has been assayed, agreeably to the rules and customs of the Mint already directed and established, or which may hereafter be directed and established, by the accounting officers of the Treasury, and to reduce the same into bars or ingots, fit for the rolling mills, and then to deliver them to the Coiner or Treasurer, as the Director shall judge expedient; and to do and perform all other duties belonging to the office of a Melter and Refiner, or which shall be ordered by the Director of the Mint.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the Melter and Refiner of the said Mint shall, before he enters upon the execution of his said office, take an oath or affirmation before some Judge of the United States, faithfully and diligently to perform the duties thereof. And, also, shall become bound to the United States of America, with one or more sureties, to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Treasury, in the sum of six thousand dollars, with condition for the faithful and diligent performance of the several duties of his office.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That there shall be allowed and paid to the said Melter and Refiner of the Mint, as a compensation for his services, the yearly salary of fifteen hundred dollars.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the Director of the Mint be, and hereby is, authorized, with the approbation of the President of the United States, to employ such person as he may judge suitable to discharge the duties of the Melter and Refiner, until a Melter and Refiner shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice of the Senate.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That the Treasurer of the Mint shall be, and he is hereby, directed to retain two cents per ounce from every deposit of silver bullion, below the standard of the United States, which hereafter shall be made for the purpose of refining and coining; and four cents per ounce from every deposit of gold bullion made as aforesaid, below the standard of the United States, unless the same shall be so far below the standard as to require the operation of the test, in which case the Treasurer shall retain six cents per ounce, which sum so retained shall be accounted for by the said Treasurer with the Treasury of the United States, as a compensation for melting and refining the same.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That the Treasurer of the Mint shall not be obliged to receive from any person, for the purpose of refining and coining, any deposit of silver bullion, below the standard of the United States, in a smaller quantity than two hundred ounces; nor a like deposit of gold bullion below the said standard, in a smaller quantity than twenty ounces.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That, from and after the passing of this act, it shall and may be lawful for the officers of the Mint to give a preference to silver or gold bullion, deposited for coinage, which shall be of the standard of the United States, so far as respects the coining of the same, although bullion below the standard, and not yet refined, may have been deposited for coinage, previous thereto, any law to the contrary notwithstanding: Provided, That nothing herein shall justify the officers of the Mint, or any one of them, in unnecessarily delaying the refining any silver or gold bullion below standard, that may be deposited as aforesaid.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized, whenever he shall think it for the benefit of the United States, to reduce the weight of the copper coin of the United States: Provided, Such reduction shall not, in the whole, exceed two pennyweights in each cent, and in the like proportion in a half cent; of which he shall give notice by Proclamation, and communicate the same to the then next session of Congress.

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the Treasurer of the United States, from time to time, as often as he shall receive copper cents and half cents from the Treasurer of the Mint, to send them to the Bank or Branch Banks of the United States, in each of the States where such Bank is established; and where there is no Bank established, then to the Collector of the principal town in such State, (in the proportion of the number of inhabitants of such State,) to be by such Bank or Collector paid out to the citizens of the State for cash, in sums not less than ten dollars value: and that the same be done at the risk and expense of the United States, under such regulations as shall be prescribed by the Department of the Treasury.

Approved, March 3, 1795.

An Act for the more effectual recovery of debts due from individuals to the United States.

BE IT ENACTED, &c., That the Comptroller of the Treasury be, and is hereby, authorized to issue a notification to any person who has received moneys for which he is accountable to the United States, or to the executor or administrator of such person, if he be deceased, requiring him to render to the Auditor of the Treasury, at such time as he shall think reasonable, according to the circumstances of the case, within twelve months from the date of such notification, all his accounts and vouchers, for the expenditure of the said moneys, and in default thereof, suits shall, at the discretion of the Comptroller of the Treasury be commenced for the same, without further notice. And the party sued as aforesaid, shall be subject to the costs and charges of such suits, whether the ultimate decision shall be in his favor or against him.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the Marshals of the respective districts be, and are hereby, authorized and directed to serve the said notifications on the parties therein named, by leaving in copies thereof at their respective dwellings, or usual places of abode, at least four months before the time fixed in such notification for rendering their accounts, as aforesaid, and that the return of the said notifications to the Comptroller's office, with the Marshal's certificate thereon, that such service has been made, be deemed legal evidence in the District or Circuit Courts, of the proceeding, and for the recovery of costs and charges. And that in cases where accounts shall be rendered to the Auditor of the Treasury, within the time limited in the notifications aforesaid, he shall immediately proceed to liquidate the credits to be passed for the said accounts, and report the same to the Comptroller, with a particular list of any claims which shall have been disallowed by him. And that the Comptroller of the Treasury immediately proceed to the examination of the credits allowed by the Auditor, and if the same be approved by him, that he cause credit therefor to be passed on the public books. And the Comptroller shall also appoint a day for hearing the claimant on the claims so disallowed by the Auditor, as aforesaid.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That a list of all such credits aforesaid, as shall have been claimed, and not admitted by the Comptroller, be made out and transmitted to the Marshal of the district, where the claimant resides; and that a copy thereof be served on the claimant, or left at his dwelling or last usual place of abode, with notice of the time assigned by the Comptroller, for the final hearing, as aforesaid, at least four months before such hearing: of which proceedings, the Marshal is hereby directed to transmit an official return to the Comptroller. And in case of omission or neglect on the part of the claimant to assign in writing, or otherwise, his reasons to the Comptroller, within the time limited, as aforesaid, why the suspended credits should be admitted, all future claims therefor shall be, and are hereby forever barred. But in case the claimant shall, within the time aforesaid, assign in writing, or otherwise, his reasons why the suspended credits should be admitted, the Comptroller shall immediately consider the same, and decide thereon according to the principles of equity, and the usages of the Treasury Department.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That in all cases where the final decision of the Comptroller shall be against the claimant, such determination shall be final and conclusive to all concerned.

Approved, March 3, 1795.

Acts of Congress.

An Act to authorize a grant of lands to the French inhabitants of Gallipolis, and for other purposes therein mentioned.

Be it enacted, &c., That the President of the United States shall be, and he is hereby authorized and empowered to cause to be surveyed in the Territory Northwest of the Ohio, a tract of land situated on the northerly bank of the river Ohio, beginning one mile and a half on a straight line above the mouth of Little Sandy, thence down the said river Ohio, along the courses thereof eight miles when reduced to a straight line, thence at right angles from each extremity of the said line, so as to include the quantity of twenty-four thousand acres of land to be disposed as hereinafter directed.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the President be authorized to cause to be ascertained the number of French inhabitants and actual settlers of the town or settlement of Gallipolis, being males above eighteen years of age, or widows who are or shall be within the said town or settlement of Gallipolis on the first day of November next.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the President of the United States shall be, and he is hereby authorized and empowered, to issue letters patent in the name and under the seal of the United States, thereby granting to John Gabriel Gervais and his heirs, four thousand acres of land, part of the said twenty-four thousand acres to be located on the Northwest bank of the river Ohio opposite to the mouth of the Little Sandy with conditions in the said letters patent that if the said John Gabriel Gervais or his heirs, shall not personally settle on the same tract of land, and continue settled for three years next thereafter, the same letters patent shall be void and determine, and the title thereof revert in the United States, as if this law had not passed.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the President of the United States shall be, and he is hereby authorized and empowered to cause to be surveyed, laid off, and divided, the remaining twenty thousand acres of land, residue of the twenty-four thousand acres, into as many lots or parts as the actual settlers of Gallipolis shall, on the ascertainment aforesaid, amount to, and the same to be designated, marked, and numbered, on a plat thereof, to be returned to the Secretary of the said Territory, together with a certificate of the courses of the said lots, the said lots, or parts of the aforesaid tract, to be assigned to the settlers aforesaid by lot. And the President of the United States is hereby authorized and empowered, to issue letters patent as aforesaid, to the said actual settlers and their heirs, for the said twenty thousand acres to be held by them in severalty in lots to be designated and described by their numbers on the plat aforesaid, with condition in the same letters patent, that if one or more of the said grantees, his or her heirs or assigns, shall not, within five years from the date of the same letters, make or cause and procure to be made an actual settlement on the lot or lots assigned to him, her or them, and the same continue for five years thereafter, that then the said letters patent, so far as concerns the said lot or lots not settled and continued to be settled as aforesaid, shall cease and determine, and the title thereof shall revert in the United States in the same manner as if this law had not passed.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That nothing in this act shall be taken or considered in any manner to impair or affect the claims of the said settlers against any person or persons, for or by reason of any contracts heretofore made by them, but that the same contracts shall be and remain in the same state as if this law had not passed.

Approved, March 3, 1795.

An Act for the more general promulgation of the Laws of the United States.

Be it enacted, &c., That for the more general promulgation of the Laws of the United States, the Secretary for the Department of State shall, after the end of the next session of Congress, cause to be printed and collated, at the public expense, a complete edition of the Laws of the United States, comprising the Constitution of the United States, the Public Acts then in force, and the Treaties, together with an index to the same.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That, four thousand five hundred copies of the said edition, shall be divided by the said Secretary, among the respective States and the Territories Northwest and South of the river Ohio, according to the rule for apportioning representatives; and that the proportion of each State or Territory, shall be transmitted by the said Secretary to the Governor or Supreme Executive Magistrate thereof, to be deposited in such fixed and convenient place in each county, or other subordinate civil division of such State or Territory, as the Executive or Legislature thereof shall deem most conducive to the general information of the people; and that five hundred copies of the said edition be reserved for the future disposition of Congress.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the acts passed at each succeeding session of Congress, including future Treaties, shall be printed and distributed in like manner and proportion.

Approved, March 3, 1795.

An Act making provision for the purposes of trade with the Indians.

Be it enacted, &c., That a sum not exceeding fifty thousand dollars be appropriated to the purchase of goods for supplying the Indians within the limits of the United States, for the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-five; and the sale of such goods be made under the direction of the President of the United States.

Approved, March 3, 1795.

An Act to regulate the compensation of Clerks.

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of the Department of State, and the Secretary of the Department of

Acts of Congress.

War, be authorized to vary, for the present year, the compensation heretofore established for clerks in their respective Departments, in such manner as the services to be performed shall in their judgment require; so, however, that no principal clerk shall receive more than at the rate of one thousand dollars per annum, and that the aggregate of the compensations for clerks in either of the said Departments shall not for the said year exceed the aggregate of the compensations allowed for clerks in the same Department for the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-four; and that an additional compensation not exceeding the rate of two hundred dollars per annum be allowed for one clerk employed by the Director of the Mint during the present year.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That there be allowed for the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-five, to the Commissioners of Loans in the States of Massachusetts and New York, respectively, not exceeding five clerks at the rate of five hundred dollars each; to the Commissioner of Loans in the State of Connecticut, not exceeding two clerks at the rate of four hundred dollars each; and to the Commissioner of Loans in the States of Pennsylvania, Virginia, and South Carolina respectively, not exceeding two clerks at the rate of five hundred dollars each. The aggregate of the compensations for clerks employed by either of the said Commissioners to be apportioned among them at his discretion. That there be allowed for the year aforesaid, in lieu of clerk hire, to the Commissioner of Loans in the State of New Hampshire, three hundred and fifty dollars; to the Commissioner of Loans in the State of Rhode Island, four hundred dollars; to the Commissioner of Loans in the State of New Jersey, three hundred dollars; and to the Commissioner of Loans in the State of Maryland, two hundred and fifty dollars.

Approved, March 3, 1795.

An Act authorizing the exportation of arms, cannon, and military stores, in certain cases.

Be it enacted, &c., That in cases connected with the security of the commercial interest of the United States, and for public purposes only, the President of the United States be, and hereby is authorized to permit the exportation of arms, cannon, and military stores, the law prohibiting the exportation of the same to the contrary notwithstanding.

Approved, March 3, 1795.
